That the evidence before the committee shows that Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton served in the Rhode Island line from the commencement to the close of the revolutionary war; that his father and ten brothers all held commissions as officers in the British service, and that he alone sacrificed his home and domestic ties for the cause of liberty; that he was disinherited by his father, Colonel Caleb Wheaton, who commanded a regiment of British pioneers, who, to the day of his death, never forgave his son for what he considered a disloyalty to the King of Great Britain in joining "the Yankee rebels;" that on the 11th of May, 1775, and long before war was declared, he joined a band of volunteers, and took an active part in capturing the Margaretta and two other armed British schooners, which were of great service to us in after times, and was the first advantage gained over our enemies on the waters. In this service he received a severe saber wound on the head, which troubled his mind through life, and terminated in his dying in the insane asylum, in Baltimore, in the year 1828.

After the war was declared, Joseph Wheaton joined the Rhode Island line, in Colonel Israel Angell's regiment, and sharing in all the battles in which that part of the Army was engaged, which seem to have been many, never left his regiment until the end of the war. He was invested with a commission as colonel in the war of 1812, through the whole of which he served with distinguished ability.

By the acts of Congress of 3d and 21st of October, 1780, the Government of the United States promised to pay to each and all of the officers, individually, who should continue to serve until the end of the war, half-pay for life, and to pay the same to said officers, or their legal representatives, in specie or other current money at the end of each and every year for life. This was a distinct offer and covenant, stipulated by the most solemn act of the Government, in 1780, after four years and upward of hard service in field and camp by Joseph Wheaton, among others, and was offered as an inducement to cause him to continue in the service until defeat or victory should mark the close of the contest. If defeated, he, with his compeers, had nothing to hope for but the rebel's fate; if victorious, he would have the stipulated compensation of the promised half-pay to buy him bread for the balance of his days. He accepted the offer, fulfilled the contract, and served to the end of the war, thus establishing his unqualified right to said half-pay.

It was decided by the Court of Claims, in the case of Thomas H. Baird, administrator of Dr. Absalom Baird, deceased, that the acts of Congress of 3d and 21st of October, 1780, created a legal liability against the United States in favor of the officers therein referred to, which no subsequent legislation by Congress could release without the assent of the other party. Your committee find that this decision of the Court of Claims was sanctioned by Congress by an act approved August 18, 1856.

The Committee on Revolutionary Claims, in the Thirty-sixth Congress, made a favorable report in this case, and in the Thirty-seventh Congress the claim was referred by resolution of the House to the Secretary of the Interior for adjustment. In reply the Secretary of the Interior submits the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March, 27, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted on the 14th instant, referring to this Department for adjustment the claim of Mary A. Berault, administratrix of the late Joseph Wheaton.

Upon an examination of the papers referred to me, I am fully satisfied of the justice of this claim, and concur in the report of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims in its favor. The services of Lieutenant Wheaton were of a highly meritorious character, and continued from a time anterior to the passage of the act of Congress of October, 1780, promising half-pay for life to those who should serve until the end of the war, until the final and successful termination of the revolutionary struggle.

The principle upon which the claim is based has been recognized and sustained by the Court of Claims, in the case of Dr. Baird, and the decision of that court has received the sanction of Congress.

I should not hesitate to adjust and allow the claim, as recommended by the resolution of the House of Representatives, if any fund were placed at my disposal from which it could be paid; but no appropriation has been made which is applicable to the payment of claims of this character.

I therefore return the papers, with a recommendation that an appropriation be made by Congress for its payment.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

CALEB B. SMITH,
Secretary of the Interior.

Hon. GALUSHA A. GROW,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

At the last session of the Forty-first Congress the claim was passed by the House by a two-thirds vote, and this committee unanimously reported in favor of its passage by the Senate, but owing to the lateness of the session no action was taken upon it by the Senate.

Your committee are of opinion, from a careful examination of the case, that this claim is embraced within the acts of the 3d and 21st of October, 1780. The half-pay should terminate on the 24th day of March, 1818, when Lieutenant Wheaton was placed on the pension-roll, and there should be deducted from the said half-pay any payments made by the Government to said Wheaton on account of his said services.

Your committee report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the bill read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I dislike——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is objection to the consideration of this bill the Chair must call for the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do object to it most decidedly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is Senate bill No. 432.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 1587) for the relief of William H. Pilkenton, late a second lieutenant in Company G, Fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 622) for the relief of John N. Newman, late an acting first lieutenant of Company B, Ninth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. No. 1770) for the relief of Jonathan L. Mann, late a chaplain in the volunteer service of the Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 1771) for the relief of Rice M. Brown;

A bill (H. R. No. 1772) for the relief of William N. Williams, late a second lieutenant of Indiana Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1773) for the relief of Samuel E. Rankin;

A bill (H. R. No. 1774) for the relief of Matthias Whitehead;

A bill (H. R. No. 363) for the relief of Lucius A. Rountree;

A bill (H. R. No. 368) for the relief of James Long;

A bill (H. R. No. 498) to settle the accounts of Captain A. B. Dyer;

A bill (H. R. No. 1271) for the relief of John T. Watson, of Cincinnati, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 1768) for the relief of Ephraim P. Showalter;

A bill (H. R. No. 1779) for the relief of William E. Childs; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) authorizing the issue of clothing to certain enlisted men of the Army.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

A bill (H. R. No. 526) for the relief of James De Long; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1589) for the relief of Henry Savage, acting chargé d'affaires of the United States in Guatemala from May 7, 1856, to November 14, 1858.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. No. 1759) for the relief of Henry S. Welles; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1365) to grant an American register to the Canadian schooner George Warren.

The bill (H. R. No. 1763) to permit Edward Savage, of Minnesota, to enter one quarter-section of the public lands, or any legal subdivision of the same, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. No. 2102) to incorporate the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 20th instant, approved and signed the bill (S. No. 29) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of expense incurred by the territorial authorities of Dakota for arms, equipments, military stores, supplies, and all other expenses of the volunteer forces of the Indian war of 1862.

The message also announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 438) to withhold from sale the site of the old Nyatt Point light-house; and

A bill (S. No. 269) to change the titles of certain naval officers, and for other purposes.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, I would respectfully ask to have the question before the Senate, as it now stands, restated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will restate the pending question.

The CHIEF CLERK. The question is on the motion of Mr. BUCKINGHAM to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance, to which have been added, on motion of Mr. MERRIMON, the following instructions:

And that the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, instructed to report, as soon as practicable, a bill providing for the increase of the national-bank circulation, so that the whole volume thereof shall not exceed $400,000,000.

Mr. SCHURZ. Is there not an amendment to that providing for free banking?

The CHIEF CLERK. No, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me a moment, on Friday evening, when this subject was before the Senate, at a ate hour, just before we went into executive session, I offered an amendment looking to free banking; and the Chair, without some of us knowing what was being done, decided that it was lost, after putting the question. I now, by permission of the Senator from Missouri, renew that amendment, and it can remain until such time as he has concluded his speech. The amendment is to add "and also for free banking."

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROBERTSON in the chair.) The Senator from West Virginia can make that motion after the Senator from Missouri has concluded his remarks.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am not disposed to put any obstacle in the way of the passage of the proposition for free banking; at the same time I feel it my duty to state to the Senator from West Virginia, as I occupied the chair when his amendment was presented, that the Chair stated the character of the vote of the Senate and paused long enough for objection, and no objection being made, the Chair declared the amendment proposed by the Senator lost. I state this in justice to the occupant of the chair at that time, and therefore I shall be compelled to make the point of order that the amendment is not in order now.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, it will be observed from the statement of the question as it has come from the Chair that the demand made at present by those who desire an expansion of the currency falls far short of what it originally was. It may fairly be assumed that, if we adopt the present proposition, it will serve merely as an entering wedge to prepare the way for greater exaction.

It was not my intention to address the Senate at length on the bill before us until on Friday, when we took the last votes on the instructions to be given to the committee. I had hoped that from the confused jumble of propositions and counter-propositions with which this bill had been incumbered nothing would issue that might be seriously detrimental to the best interests of the country. That hope has been turned into something like apprehension, and I feel it my duty now to submit some observations to the Senate.

The Senate has been during these weeks of debate presenting a most extraordinary spectacle. In the second half of the nineteenth century, with the uniform experience of ages before us, in a period of profound peace, with no public dangers pressing upon us the necessity of exceptional measures, with ample resources to defray the expenses of the Government and to develop the resources of the country, the highest legislative body of this Republic, which is proud of calling itself the most progressive state of the world, is seriously debating the question whether new issues of irredeemable paper money shall not be resorted to in order to promote the prosperity of the nation; and such an almost incredible proposition is supported by arguments which will make the civilized world stare if they ever become widely known beyond these precincts.

It has actually been asserted in this body that the precious metals can no longer remain the standard of value in any country. Why? Because the aggregate quantity and value of the precious metals in existence do not equal in value the aggregate amount of all the products of industry and agriculture; an idea just as original and as luminous as it would be to say that a yard-stick cannot remain a standard measure of length because a yard-stick is not as long as a roll of cloth or of carpet whose length is to be ascertained, or because all the existing yard-sticks in the world put together would not have the same length as all the objects whose length is to be measured.

We have been gravely told that conclusive proof of the insufficiency of the amount of currency in this country is furnished by the fact that England and France have a larger volume of currency than we have, and that there are many people in the country who cannot get all the loans and all the discounts which they desire. We have heard it asserted that an irredeemable currency must be a good thing after all, because there are three countries in Europe—Austria, Russia, and Italy—whose economic development has been somewhat rapid of late, while those countries have an irredeemable paper currency. Nobody who knows anything about those countries can be ignorant of the fact that the sudden development referred to has been brought about by great and beneficent changes in their political and social organization, setting free and putting to work all the productive forces of society, and that the leading statesmen of those countries are day and night racking their brains to find means by which to get rid of that curse of an irredeemable paper money, which is here represented as the very source of prosperity. And I would say to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] who advanced that proposition here, that if he should hold up to those leading statesmen their irredeemable currency as an element of progress, they would receive the assertion with a melancholy smile of derision.

We have been assured here that a sufficient issue of irredeemable paper money will make money as easy in Georgia as it is in England; and that the rates of interest will go down as the quantity of irredeemable currency increases. It has been asserted, in an endless variation of forms, that currency and capital are materially the same thing. But the very climax is reached when we are told that such doctrines, a hundred times exploded as hollow fallacies by the experience of centuries, are in reality the most progressive ideas of this age; that this is the age of railroads and of telegraphs; that society is transformed; and that the notion of the precious metals remaining the standard of value and a medium of exchange is one of those obsolete ideas which only old fogies will adhere to.

Sir, let us examine a little into the progressive character of these ideas. Here in my hand I hold an edition of Marco Polo's Travels, showing that this progressive idea prevailed in China many centuries ago; and I think it will be instructive to the Senate to learn how much of this progress of ideas lies already behind us.

Marco Polo tells the following story:

Now that I have told you in detail of the splendor of this city of the Emperor's, I shall proceed to tell you of the mint which he hath in the same city, in the which he hath his money coined and struck, as I shall relate to you. And in doing so I shall make manifest to you how it is that the Great Lord may well be able to accomplish even much more than I have told you or am going to tell you in this book. For, tell it how I might, you never would be satisfied that I was keeping within truth and reason!

The Emperor's mint, then, is in this same city of Cambaluc, and the way it is wrought is such, that you might say he hath the secret of alchemy in perfection, and you would be right! For he makes his money after this fashion:

He makes them take off the bark of a certain tree, in fact of the mulberry tree, the leaves of which are the food of the silk-worms; these trees being so numerous that whole districts are full of them. What they take is a certain fine white bast, or skin, which lies between the wood of the tree and the thick outer bark, and this they make into something resembling sheets of paper, but black. When these sheets have been prepared, they are cut up into pieces of different sizes. The smallest of these sizes is worth a half tornesel. the next, a little larger, one tornesel; one, a little larger still, is worth half a silver groat of Venice; another a whole groat; others yet two groats. five groats, and ten groats. There is also a kind worth one bezant of gold, and others of three bezants, and so up to ten. All of these pieces of paper are issued with as much solemnity and authority as if they were of pure gold or silver; and on every piece a variety of officials, whose duty it is, have to write their names and to put their seals. And when all is prepared duly, the chief officer deputed by the Kaan smears the seal intrusted to him with vermillion, and impresses it on the paper, so that the form of the seal remains stamped upon it in red; the money is then authentic. Any one forging it would be punished with death. And the Kaan causes every year to be made such a vast quantity of this money, which costs him nothing, that it must equal in amount all the treasure in the world.

With these pieces of paper, made as I have described, he causes all payments on his own account to be made; and he makes them to pass current universally over all his kingdoms and provinces and territories, and whithersoever his power and sovereignty extends. And nobody, however important he may think himself, dares to refuse them on pain of death.

So you see they understood then the art of how to make paper money a legal tender!

And, indeed, everybody takes them readily; for wheresoever a person may go throughout the Great Kaan's dominions he shall find these pieces of paper current, and shall be able to transact all sales and purchases of goods by means of them just as well as if they were coins of pure gold. And all the while they are so light, that ten bezants' worth does not weigh one golden bezant.

Now he goes on to show how the Kaan is able with this money to buy all precious things, and how his treasury is gradually being filled, and then concludes:

Now you have heard the ways and means whereby the Great Kaan may have, and in fact has, more treasure than all the kings in the world; and you know all about it and the reason why.—Travels of Marco Polo, volume 1, pages 378, 379.

Yes, we do know the reason why; and know something of it from our own experience. Now, sir, the first issues of paper money, as they are traced in the history of China by the learned editor of this work, are as old as the beginning of the ninth century of this era; something over a thousand years. When the system had prevailed a certain period, it was found that the paper money became more and more worthless; then new issues were made to take up the old ones, and one piece of the new issue was exchanged for five of the old ones; thus making a settlement on the basis of 20 per cent., the people losing 80 per cent. We are informed that such a proceeding was twice repeated, and probably a number of such settlements were made of which no knowledge has reached us; so that while the Great Kaan grew rich, the people grew poorer and poorer.

Then under the Ming dynasty the government found still another method of more efficiently turning the system to the advantage of the ruler; for the government paid in paper, but took only its dues in the precious metals; and he who would not obey its behests was put to death. The paper money depreciated to almost nothing; and the whole "progressive" system finally broke down. As Marco Polo would say, "You know the reason why."

In 1294 a Persian monarch initiated a similar system, which produced severe distress, greatly impoverishing the people, and he was murdered in a popular revulsion.

I need not go through the whole history of paper money in Asia to show that the progressive idea of superseding the precious metals with paper money, and especially with an irredeemable paper money, was discovered and tried there; and that the progressive gentlemen who reiterate the same idea as a new discovery are just as progressive as the Chinese were over a thousand years ago.

But, sir, the same progressive idea which was tried and exploded there was discovered by the great Scotch financier, Law, once more at the beginning of the eighteenth century, with the same success Law carried it to the full extent of its progressiveness, and had to flee for his life after the bubble had collapsed. Tried and exploded again!

Then we had the French assignats. The country was made immensely rich; there were pieces of paper money enough to cover all the land, and to wrap up all the articles bought and sold. Then the collapse came; and at present you find them as wall-paper covering the cottages of French peasants, to serve as warning examples. Tried and exploded once more!

We had our own continental money, the history of which is familiar to you. Tried and exploded again!

The theory of the progressive system was discussed with more than ordinary thoroughness in the British Parliament in the debates on the report of the bullion committee. Tried and exploded again!

And now, after all these teachings of history, the same progressive ideas appear as something new in the Senate of the United States. But, sir, when these same fallacies, so hoary with age and so overshadowed with the condemnation of experience, are still repeated again and again in the Senate of the United States, in spite of overwhelming refutation on the spot; when they still seem to be believed in by some; and when, finally, the venerable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] rises and tells us that the very fact of the abundance of money in the great centers at the present moment is conclusive proof that there is not enough of it in the country, and when the same Senator tries to make us believe that by voting for inflation we shall, with him, make war upon the monopolists and the wicked speculators and money-changers, then, sir, I may be pardoned if at this late stage of the debate I come forward once more to speak of first principles.

I want it distinctly understood that the object of the remarks I am going to make will be distinctly this: I desire to show, first, that the gentlemen who favor an expansion of the currency labor under an essentially erroneous conception of the nature of the difficulties for which they want to provide; and, secondly, that the remedies which they propose will not effect a cure at all, but will rather aggravate the evil.

An inflation of our paper money is demanded of us in any form, the form of greenbacks, the form of national-bank currency, or both combined, but an inflation in any event upon one single ground—that there is at present an insufficient supply of currency in this land to fill the legitimate requirements of the business of the country. No other reason is given; and upon that ground the American people are to be put through the same experience which has cost ourselves and other nations who have tried it, so dearly, and a gratuitous repetition of which will be justly looked upon by every sensible man in the world as little short of an act of madness.

The assumption that the volume of our currency falls short of the actual requirements of the legitimate business of the country forms the basis and the only basis of all the arguments that are made here in favor of expansion. Is that assumption correct? I deny its correctness. In the first speech that I made on this subject, I stated a principle which furnishes a test. I said, assuming that the people have confidence in the Government issuing an irredeemable currency, that currency will not necessarily depreciate or stand at a discount as to gold, as long as it simply supersedes and does not exceed in volume the gold and silver, and the bank currency based upon gold and silver, which would suffice to transact the business of that country; but, the condition of confidence remaining the same, the irredeemable currency will depreciate, will be at a discount as to gold, as soon as its volume exceeds that quantity. When such depreciation steadily continues under the same conditions of confidence, it is a sure sign that the volume of currency is in excess of the real requirements of the legitimate business of the country. I asked this question: if our currency were insufficient, would it have been possible for the general prices of commodities to remain so long at the high inflation point at which they have stood for years? If really the amount of currency were so insufficient as to impede the necessary transactions of the business of the country, is it not certain that the gold in the country, which is now hiding itself, would have been driven out of its hiding places to fill the vacuum occasioned by the insufficiency?

The proposition has remained absolutely unanswered. Indeed, very ingenious efforts have been made to obscure the question. Senators have tried very hard to shed a brilliant flood of darkness upon this subject, and in a measure they have succeeded.

We have been told that in France and in England the volume of currency is much larger than here, although neither the population nor the extent of the country equals ours. That may be true; but I ask what are the circumstances determining the volume of currency necessary for the real requirements of the business of a country?

Is it area? Is it extent of territory? Is it the number of square miles? Why, sir, look at all the new Territories of the United States, and there is not a man in this body who will assert that, large as they are, they all together combined would require for their business as much currency as the city of Boston. Therefore it cannot be area; it cannot be extent of territory alone.

Is it population? Look at the whole interior of Africa, with its teeming millions of population, and I am sure the business of the whole interior of Africa does not require half as much currency as the single State of Rhode Island. Therefore it cannot be population alone.

I ask then, is it the amount of productions, the number of exchanges and of values involved? But the same amount of production, the same number of exchanges, the same values involved will require far less currency where there are superior facilities of rapid communication, of banking and clearing-house systems, than where they do not exist.

Neither of these elements alone, therefore, will determine the amount of currency which is necessary for the business of a country, but all of them combined will.

Of course I use the word "currency" here in the most restricted sense of the term, not including deposits, bills, and checks, as some political economists justly do. Where banks and clearing-houses exist, and the use of bills and checks in the transaction of business is common, currency is mainly used for daily running expenses, for the payment of wages and salaries, and for the settlement of balances. Business transactions in which the whole amount of the value of a commodity passes from hand to hand in the shape of money are exceedingly rare.

Let us in this light compare England with the United States. In England, as well as in all European countries, the number of persons receiving salaries and wages is far greater in proportion than in the United States, and every one who is acquainted with those countries knows it. There are large armies there, large navies, which we have not. The number of private servants is much larger than here. The number of operatives and daily laborers is still greater. Now, although the population of the United Kingdom is only thirty-two million, while ours is forty million, yet the number of persons receiving salaries and wages is not only in proportion, but actually greater, much greater in England than here; and although wages rule higher here than they do there, yet I think I do not venture much when I say that the aggregate amount paid in wages and salaries in England is much larger than it is in the United States.

But there is another point of great importance. The number of exchanges and the values involved in them are, I might say, infinitely greater there than in the United States. When you compare the exports and imports of Great Britain with those of the United States, you will find that the former are about three times greater than the latter. But that does not cover the case. As everybody knows, England is, so to speak, the clearing-house of the world, and there are probably more balances settled in England than in the rest of Europe put together. In all respects, therefore, where the actual handling of money is actually required, that use is much more extensively required in England than it is in the United States; and if there is a larger volume of currency there, it is because the very nature of the case demands a much larger volume; and yet, as we know, the volume of banking currency has, within the last thirty years, not only not materially increased, but it has, I think, even diminished.

Now go over to France. There the army is still far greater than in England; the navy about the same; the number of persons receiving salaries and wages still larger than in England, and of course far greater than in the United States. As to the amount of business transacted, if you compare the aggregate of imports and exports with ours, you will find that the aggregate is about one-third larger. But then, sir, there is still another circumstance to be taken into consideration. In no country in Europe, I think, is there a smaller proportion of banking facilities than in France. The clearing-house system is unknown there, and the transactions carried on through bills and checks are more limited than in any other country in Western Europe. But, what is still more important, there are no more inveterate hoarders of money in the world than the French. In no country will you find so large a number of people who will put gold or silver in old boxes or earthen pots under their beds as in France. In some parts of France you can scarcely make a peasant take a bank-note, because he still remembers the assignats; and, to repeat what I said before, a great many cottages in France are papered with the old assignats, to serve to all coming generations as a warning example.

Thus it seems to me that the comparison between these three countries completely fails, because the conditions of business on which they are based are wholly different. The true test, as I stated it, stands therefore absolutely unimpeached.

But I am met with the assertion that in some sections of the country a scarcity of money is sometimes actually felt by legitimate business. That has undoubtedly been so at certain periods. I showed the other day by numerous and impartial market reports that in the business centers of the country money is at present in abundance, if not in superabundance. There has been much excited squirming about this fact on the part of the advocates of inflation, and attempts were made to deny it, but the evidence was so overwhelming that at last gentlemen took refuge in the assumption that this abundance of money in the business centers of the country was owing to the expansion of the currency by the drafts that have been made upon the $44,000,000 reserve, and that assertion was put forward in a somewhat triumphant manner.

A single statement will suffice to show the falsity of that assertion. On the 15th of February, 1873, the outstanding greenbacks amounted to $356,000,000, of which the banks in the three cities of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia held $63,797,982. On the 16th of February, 1874, the outstanding greenbacks amounted to $381,327,327, of which the same banks in Philadelphia, New York, and Boston held $87,228,654. The currency had been inflated to the amount of $25,327,327, and three cities—New York, Boston, and Philadelphia—had absorbed the whole of the increase with the exception of $1,896,645. This shows that almost the whole increase remained in three cities in the East, and the States of Rhode Island and Connecticut, with their great banking establishments, are not even taken into account. A large portion of the balance undoubtedly remained there, so that probably something far short of a million has gone West and South of the $25,000,000 that were put out by the Treasury in addition to the existing volume of currency. It serves to indicate also what will become of further issues, and how they will be distributed. Senators may figure it out for themselves how much would go to each State at that rate, if one hundred millions were put out, and these three cities are to retain so large a proportion.

No, sir; the cause of the abundance in the money market, especially in the western business centers, is a different one. First, the crops have been very large, and found a very good and ready market. This resulted in a positive increase of the real wealth of the producing States. Secondly, the crisis broke down speculation and gambling, and released large amounts employed in floating that speculation and gambling, and those large amounts are now in the loan market. That is the reason why money is abundant in the western business centers.

But I am willing to admit that the present abundance of money in the loan market is of a precarious nature. As an irredeemable and redundant currency always begets speculation and gambling, it will do so again in spite of the check that was put upon it by the recent crisis. It is already reviving, although carried on, as I am informed, to a certain extent by a different set of persons and in different ways; but its revival will undoubtedly be quickened, as is always the case, by every addition to our irredeemable currency. It may revive more rapidly even than legitimate business does; and as it grows to greater dimensions, it will draw away from legitimate business and press into the service of speculation as large an amount of currency as it can lay hold of. The expansion of speculation, therefore, is likely, nay, it is certain, to reduce the present abundance of money in the loan market, and again to bring forth here and there a feeling of scarcity. This I think will only be a question of time.

But now, sir, I maintain, first, that although there is an excess of currency in the country over and above the real requirements of legitimate business, a feeling of scarcity may, nay, I say it will, ensue as speculation expands; and, secondly, that this evil will not only not be remedied, but will be aggravated by inflation.

And here I will call the attention of Senators on the opposite side to the fundamental error which lies at the bottom of all their arguments. From the fact that a scarcity of currency is sometimes felt by legitimate business, they draw the conclusion that the aggregate volume of currency in the country is insufficient for the real requirements of that business. This conclusion is utterly and glaringly fallacious. Gentlemen confound two things which are essentially different from one another. One is an insufficiency of the aggregate amount of currency in the country, and the other is a vicious diffusion of that currency really sufficient and more than sufficient for all legitimate purposes. The difficulty is not that there is not enough currency on the whole; but, first, that one part of the country is not as rich as the other; and, secondly, that legitimate business is apt not to control enough of currency, because illegitimate business, speculation, and gambling, control too much. This is one of the evils inherent to an irredeemable and fluctuating paper money; and I repeat that evil cannot only not be remedied by an inflation of the same paper money, but it will be seriously aggravated by it, for the simple reason that inflation always stimulates speculation and gambling.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] having been quite prominent in this debate, I take his State as an illustration. He complains that in North Carolina the people are impoverished, that business is cramped, that banking capital is scarce, that rates of interest are high, and so on. All this is true. I sincerely sympathize with the Senator and his people, and he can scarcely be more anxious to do something to aid them than I am. We are entirely agreed as to the object; but now let us scrutinize the means. The Senator wants more paper money for his people, and therefore he advocates an expansion of the currency. At first he advocated an expansion of the legal-tender currency, and I admit that would certainly be the most efficient means. Now suppose it were made; suppose we issue one hundred or two hundred millions of our irredeemable legal-tenders, how will it operate? Gentlemen speak as if the Government of the United States, issuing an additional amount of paper money, were at the same time issuing a proclamation to the country running somewhat in this way: "All ye who are weary and heavily laden, come to me that I may put money into your pockets. You, good farmer, have a mortgage on your farm and cannot pay it, here is the $2,000 you want; pay it back when you can. You, enterprising manufacturer, want to extend your business and employ more workmen; you want, say, $200,000 or $300,000; you can have it immediately; here it is. You, good merchant, want to carry on a larger trade and you are cramped by a want of means; there is nothing in the world easier than to help you." Gentlemen, this sounds extremely preposterous, and yet I assert there have been arguments made in the Senate of the United States which would apply only to such a condition of things, and there are thousands and thousands of people in the country who have been made to believe that an issue of additional currency would work in just that way.

But let us see how it will operate in reality. There are only two methods of putting an additional amount of currency afloat. One is by defraying the running expenses of the Government. That will not apply here, because we shall raise revenue enough for that purpose. The other is by the purchase of bonds of the United States in the market. That will necessarily have to be resorted to. What, then, will the Treasury do? The Treasury goes to buy bonds where bonds are sold; that is to say, the Treasury goes to Wall street. It carries this additional issue of currency there, and there with it buys its bonds. What is the consequence? The additional amount of currency is thrown at once into the very hot-bed of speculation. What will be the first effect? As soon as speculation is revived, to float speculative enterprise such as concentrates there; and if you want to have a proof of the fact that currency so issued will stay East, that proof is furnished by the figures which I read to the Senate only a few minutes ago, showing that the banks in only three cities—New York, Boston, and Philadelphia—had absorbed the whole of the new issue of $25,000,000, with the exception of less than two millions.

Now, sir, how will North Carolina, how will any other Southern State, be benefited by an operation like this? North Carolina will not get any share of the additional currency for nothing. North Carolina will have to buy that additional currency by offering her products in the market where that currency is distributed, just as North Carolina has to do now. She will have to buy that currency, just as she would have to buy that currency if it were not paper but gold. If those products of North Carolina are in demand, they will be bought, and currency will go to North Carolina in payment thereof as it does now, and only to that extent; no more. But the additional amount issued by the Government being right in the hot-bed of speculation, and having greatly stimulated that speculation, the rule governing the diffusion of currency will be just the reverse of what it would be under a healthy condition of business. Instead of so much currency being used to float speculation as can be spared from legitimate business, only so much currency will be apt to go into legitimate business as can be spared from floating speculative ventures. Upon the extent of that speculation, therefore, it will depend how large a proportion of currency will go from that center of speculation to North Carolina and other points; and the more extensive that speculation is, the greater the quantity of currency it will strive to press into its service and it will succeed in controlling, and the smaller the proportion, therefore, that will go into the channels of legitimate business. It follows, as a natural consequence, that everything which tends to excite, to stimulate, to increase speculation and gambling, will not remedy, but will aggravate that evil. Now it is a notorious, undoubted fact, a fact not questioned by any sane man, that an irredeemable paper currency will incite speculation and gambling to a fearful degree; nay, that by its fluctuations it will force people into speculation and gambling. The greater the inflation, therefore, the more speculation will control the currency, and the less a proportion will be left for legitimate business. Far from giving greater facilities to the transactions of legitimate business, increased inflation will only tend to increase the want far in excess of the supply. Inflation will increase the want, for it will run up the premium on gold, and have the effect of raising general prices, rendering thereby a greater volume of currency necessary to effect the same exchanges. Inflation will not in proportion increase the supply, for it will drive a larger proportion of the currency into the channels of speculation, and divert it from the channels of legitimate business. One hundred millions will not help you, and if you put out two hundred millions it will help you still less, for the appetite will not be satisfied; it will only be stimulated by the supply.

Now issue more currency, and it will go just as little where you want it to go as it does now. You can issue it; but, mark my words, you cannot force it into the channels of legitimate business, and you cannot force it out of the channels of speculation. The currency you issue will fall under the control of exactly the same class of men who control it now, only in a larger and more oppressive form. With every addition you make, a larger proportion will go into the hands of those who have too much already and use it for bad purposes; and it will increase their power to keep it out of the hands of those who have not enough, and who would use it for good purposes. You are indulging in a dangerous, I might say a childish, delusion if you think that you have any power to prevent new issues from flowing exactly the same way the old issues have gone. Increase the volume of the stream, and you will make it flow only the faster, but not in a different direction. Quibble about it as you may, draw what fancy pictures you will, you cannot deny the stern fact which stares you in the face, an inflated, irredeemable currency is not the people's money; it is the speculator's money. It will only be a more powerful weapon in the hands of the speculator to cripple legitimate business and to oppress the people the more there is of it. It always has been so, and it always will be so; and the sooner the American people make up their minds to this fact and honestly act upon it, the better it will be for their virtue as well as for their prosperity.

Now, sir, sincerely and profoundly do I sympathize with the people of the Senator from North Carolina, as I do with the people of all the States who are suffering; and I should be most happy to aid them in their distress. But, I repeat, I am profoundly convinced that inflation will not only not help them, but aggravate the evils of which they are complaining. I would not consent to give them poison, even if they asked me for it.

Senators from the South say their people need more currency. No, sir; there is another thing they need. There is another and far greater difficulty. They need more capital; and they indulge in a most fatal delusion if they think that the trick of watering their currency can supply them with that capital. There are some most obvious causes at the bottom of their difficulties. The people of the South have gone through a wasteful war, which has consumed and destroyed a very large proportion of their wealth, and thus their capital has dwindled away. The waste has been increased in some of the Southern States since the war by very bad government; and finally our tariff and the influences of an irredeemable currency have produced upon them the same depressing effect produced by the same influences everywhere upon the agricultural interest. Thus the people of the South have to make up for a very large deficit, and that deficit cannot be covered by paper promises to pay. If they want to regain their former wealth they must adopt the same methods by which wealth is created elsewhere; they must produce more, much more than they spend, and they must carefully husband and gradually accumulate their surplus earnings. That is the way to create wealth and capital available for future production. It is a somewhat slow and painful process, but it is the only process that will be really effective. This applies more or less to the people of the whole country. This is a hard fact. But sincerely as I deplore the misfortunes and embarrassments of the southern people, I cannot refrain from saying that they lose very precious time, and waste their energies and their ingenuity, if they look to any artificial contrivance for their salvation. They seem to have made themselves believe that an inflation of the currency will aid them in getting upon their feet again and accelerate their recuperation. I am strongly convinced that it will not, and I have already given some of my reasons. First, I have shown that an inflation of currency will stimulate general speculation, and that this speculation will so divert the currency from legitimate business that the latter, after the expansion, will not only not have a greater but a less proportion of it for its purposes than before; and secondly, inflation will still more depress the agricultural interest, which is the principal source of prosperity in the South as well as the West, than it is depressed now.

I made that argument before when I first had the honor to address the Senate on this subject. That argument has been attacked by several Senators; and I shall therefore restate it, and try to demonstrate its correctness still more clearly.

A considerable portion of some of the most important products of agriculture is exported, and the home price of the whole crop of those specific articles is regulated by the foreign market. That is a universally known and recognized fact. The prices ruling in the foreign market are, first, depressed by the free competition of the whole world; and, secondly, a specie standard prevailing there, they are not driven up by the inflation that has enhanced the prices of all other articles in this country. The farmer or the planter has, therefore, to sell these staple crops at the low prices regulated by the foreign market, while for all the necessaries he has to buy he pays the prices grown up to an exorbitant height, far beyond the premium on gold, by our home inflation. This was my original statement. The correctness of that statement, I say, has been questioned.

The Senator from Massachusetts on my left [Mr. BOUTWELL] said that the influence of a depreciated currency does not raise general prices by more than the amount of gold premium if the depreciation of the currency remains steady at the same point. But the difficulty is that the depreciation of the currency does not remain steady at the same point. You might just as well say that when we have a heavy fall of snow late in the winter or early in the spring, there will be no freshets in the rivers, for if the snow does not melt it will not increase the volume of the water. That is perfectly correct; but the difficulty is that the snow will melt, just as an irredeemable and inflated currency will fluctuate and will depreciate. Our experience shows us that the premium on gold in this country has not remained at the same point for a single week, scarcely for a single day.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] said that he thought the same law was governing the price of an imported article that was governing the price of an exported article in the case of a depreciated and fluctuating currency. Now, sir, I am going to show that the same law does not govern these two things. Let us see how it works. The importer or the wholesale merchant in New York, when putting up his goods for sale, will first add to the gold price the premium on gold.

That is universally conceded. But he knows that the premium on gold or the discount on the currency fluctuates, and that if the latter be inflated it will certainly depreciate. If he sells on credit, however short that credit may be, he runs this risk: that the sum he receives in paper money for his goods will not represent the same gold value which the same sum represented at the time when the sale was made; and here an important element comes into the calculation of prices, which has been left out by all the Senators who, taking the opposite view, have discussed this subject. It is the element of risk. The importer, or the manufacturer, or the wholesale dealer, must protect himself against the contingency of fluctuation; and thus he puts upon the price of his goods a certain percentage to cover that contingency. In other words, he makes his customers pay for the gambling risk which he himself has to run. The jobber who buys from the importer or the manufacturer has to put his gambling risk upon the price again, for he runs the same chance. The western or southern wholesale dealer who buys from the jobber has to do the same thing once more, for he again runs the same chance. Then the western or southern retailer, into whose hands the goods finally pass, has to do the same thing again, if he sells on credit, for he again runs the same chance. Thus two, three, or four gambling risks are put upon the price of an article before the commodity, as it issues from the hands of the original seller, passes into the hands of the consumer; and thus the rise in the price of commodities goes far beyond the premium on gold, especially when the fluctuations of the currency, as inflation will always make them, are tending in the way of depreciation.

Now go to New York and every candid merchant will tell you the same story. I know of merchants in New York who actually changed the prices of their commodities during violent fluctuations of the currency six times in one week; and one told me himself that he had done so several times in one day, always lowering or raising the gambling risk he had put upon the price of his commodities as circumstances changed. And experience teaches us that merchants are apt to be very quick in putting up prices and very slow in putting them down.

Hence it is clear that while the farmer or planter gets for his product only the gold price, with the gold premium added at the place of sale, he must pay for all he has to buy the gold price, with the premium added, and an additional amount covering the gambling risks of three or four dealers through whose hands the purchased articles pass before they reach him; and that additional amount covering the gambling risk will naturally grow very much higher when the currency is inflated and in process of depreciation. The conclusion is inevitable that in this point of view, the correctness of which cannot be questioned, an irredeemable fluctuating currency cannot be anything else but a curse to the agricultural interest, a curse the more oppressive as inflation goes on; and the more inflation there is the more the farmer will lose in buying in proportion to the prices at which he has to sell.

The other day I had a very interesting conversation with a southern planter as to the effect which an inflation of the currency would have upon his interests; and I would ask those gentlemen who have the interests of the farmers so dearly at heart to give me their attention. The planter said to me, "I am in favor of inflating the currency; but as to whether the currency should be inflated just at this present moment, I am a little doubtful." I asked why. "Well," said he, "I have sold my whole cotton crop already and received the money therefor. There is only a very small quantity left in my hands. I sold my crop, and received the money when gold was down to 10 per cent. If we inflate the currency now, and gold runs up to 15 or 20, I shall have to lay in my supplies and buy my necessaries when the currency is depreciated, and prices have risen accordingly. Thus I have sold at cheap rates and shall have to buy at high rates. This would be for me a losing business. I should prefer, therefore, that the currency be not inflated just now, but that the effect of inflation take place when I have to sell my next crop." That planter was very sensible. That the currency should be inflated when you have sold your crops, and when you have to buy your supplies, that is not what you bargained for. If the farmer or planter could inflate the currency and run up the premium on gold when he sells his crops, and then so manipulate the currency as to raise the value of paper money and depress the premium on gold when he buys his supplies, of course that would be a winning trick. But those who buy from and who sell to him would try to play the same game; and in this tricky game the honest farmer would be sure to come to grief, as he has come to grief already.

No; if the farmer or planter wants to prosper he will, above all things, use every effort within his power to rid the country of a system of currency which obliges him to sell at low and to buy at high prices. He may for a moment think that inflation will aid him in paying off his debts, if he has any; but upon consideration he will discover that debts are paid out of surplus earnings, and that his earnings will be depressed when the price of what he buys is high in proportion to the price of what he sells; that his surplus earnings will grow larger as soon as the price of what he sells is put upon an equal footing with the price of what he buys. He will discover that the trick of depreciating the legal-tender by inflation, in order to pay what he owes in a currency less valuable, will not redound to his advantage in the end, and that in this, as in all other things, honesty is, after all, the best policy. He will discover that an honest currency, which permits him to buy and sell on the same basis of value, is for him the safest basis of prosperity, and I trust the time is not far distant when the farmers, whatever artifices of demagogism may be used at present upon them, will, as one man, stand up honestly and intelligently for the earliest possible return to specie payments.

Another scheme by which more currency is to be introduced into the West and South, and a larger amount of circulating medium is to be made available for legitimate business, is the establishment of a greater number of national banks of issue. The complaint is that the Eastern States have an undue amount of national-bank circulation, and therefore enjoy in a measure a monopoly. I admit this to be true. I will not discuss here the system of banking in all its aspects, but I will inquire how far the establishment of more national banks of issue in the West and South will remedy the real evil complained of—which evil consists in a lack of loanable capital there. If the remedy proposed is to serve any good purpose at all, then the establishment of new national banks of issue must increase the available amount of loanable money. If it does not do that, it renders scarcely a service worth mentioning. Now, will it do that? The Senator from Indiana, who is always ready with his answers, says yes; that it will increase the amount of loanable money by the amount of bank-currency put out; for, he argues, the currency issued will be given out in loans and discounts which every thirty, sixty, or ninety days will return to the banks. The currency will, therefore, stay where it is issued, and not flow East. Is this sound? I assert that it is fallacious in the highest degree. The Senator simply forgets to tell us how those new banks are to get their issues.

Let us look at the provisions of the national banking act. It provides that in order to establish a national bank, United States bonds must be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and that 90 per cent. of the nominal amount of those bonds may be issued by the national bank as currency.

Now, in the first place, those who want to establish a national bank will have to deposit the bonds. It is a notorious fact that in the West the amount of United States bonds held is rather small, and in the South still smaller, and the bonds which are there are mostly held as fixed investments. The persons who want to establish national banks must therefore buy their bonds. They must buy them where bonds are sold, that is in the eastern markets; and they must buy their bonds with money. Where do they get that money? They take that money out of their home circulation, and the money so taken out of their home circulation they carry to New York. Now see how this operates. For a $1,000 bond they have to buy they pay, as 5 per cent. bonds now stand, about $1,120 in currency. That sum of $1,120 is withdrawn from their home circulation and is added to that of New York. Then they take the $1,000 bond so purchased to Washington, and for that $1,000 bond they get $900 in bank currency, and the $900 they carry home. Then they lock up 15 or 25 per cent. on the $900, as the reserve prescribed by law, in their bank vaults, as they may be country or city banks. For the $1,120 carried to New York the country bank then puts out $865 and the city bank $675 to accommodate their customers with loans and discounts. These loans and discounts may indeed come back to the bank every thirty or sixty or ninety days. But does not the Senator from Indiana see, is there anybody so blind as not to see, that a much greater amount had gone East before the western or southern bank could make any loans and discounts to its customers with its national-bank circulation? Is it not as clear as sunlight that for every $865 issued by a country bank, or every $675 issued by a city bank, $1,120 had gone to New York before? Is it not clear that the amount of loanable money, instead of being increased, has been diminished 30 or 40 per cent. by the operation? It is true that by the establishment of national banks here and there some greater banking facilities may be offered. They take deposits, and they make discounts; but the value of all the facilities thus offered will not make up for the diminution which the home circulation, the amount of loanable money has actually suffered in that locality by the process. Where, then, is the increased accommodation of the business public? Nowhere; but the result is just the reverse.

But, sir, in the establishment of a great many western and southern banks things have been done which show the effect upon the home circulation still more clearly. Banks have been established, not upon money taken out of their home circulation, but upon credit. New York bankers (and I have this from one of them) were applied to by parties from the West to advance the money for purchasing the bonds necessary for the establishment of a national bank in the West. The New York banker bought the bonds and charged a commission and interest. Then he deposited the bonds in the Treasury at Washington, and the national-bank currency was issued thereon. But that currency did not go West at all. The New York banker kept it as part payment for his advances and commission in purchasing the bonds for the western parties, and the latter had to cover the balance by drawing what money they could from the West. Can anybody tell me how the amount of loanable money was increased by this operation in that western locality where the bank was established? Not even the currency went there, but the amount covering the difference between the currency and the bonds was drawn from there, being thus a clear deduction from the home circulation. Everybody acquainted with these things knows that this has been the case in a great many instances.

But the Senator from Indiana tells us that many applications are made for permission to establish national banks in the West and South. That is probably true. Why are they made? The persons making them know well what they are doing. The bankers themselves may do a profitable business, drawing interest on their bonds and on the circulation at the same time. But the difficulty is that their profits are their own and do not benefit the business community; for the amount of loanable money which is to accommodate business men and help along enterprise is not only not increased but is seriously curtailed by the operation, and the result is not that the West or the South gets more, but that the East gets more and the West and South less available funds after it than they had before.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] was perfectly candid when he said, in opposing the bill now before us, that he did not do it because the transfer of twenty-five or fifty millions of national-bank currency from New England to the West would decrease the capital of New England one single farthing, for everybody can see that it would not, but he was pleading merely for the interest of the banking institutions, which do not want to have their business disturbed.

Now, sir, carry out this system on the largest scale, by a free-banking act, and what will be the result? It will be exactly the same, only much extended and intensified. And it is very probable, nay almost certain, that what may be called the banking monopoly of New York and New England will, by a free-banking act, not be weakened, but it will become stronger and more firmly established than ever before. And why? Simply because in the East, in New York and New England, they have the capital to invest in banking establishments; they have the bonds themselves, and can establish national banks without sending money away. They will, therefore, then as now have and keep a vast majority of the banks, and a preponderance of the national banking currency. They will of course enjoy the lion's share of the business. If gentlemen complain now of the grasp the monetary power of the East has on the West and South, we shall see that grasp not weakened but very much strengthened by what is here proposed.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SCHURZ. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON. I think, in the last remark he made, the Senator has forgotten that national banks cannot have more than a certain amount of circulation, so that I do not see how it is possible all the money should get into the city of New York. People have a right to establish banks with as much circulation as possible, but, no matter what the capital may be, they can have only so much circulation.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator will admit that, although they have at present more than by the spirit of the law they are entitled to, if we pass a free-banking act, they can, in New York and New England, establish a great many more banks than now; nothing is to hinder them; and inasmuch as they have the capital and the bonds, they have greater facility in establishing these banks than the West and South.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator is right in part, but not altogether. They may establish more banks, but these banks cannot have as much circulation as they had originally. Besides that, I hope if we pass a general banking law there will be such restrictions as will prevent capital in New York from controlling the system.

Mr. SCHURZ. Unless those restrictions amount to this, that the people of certain States shall be prohibited from establishing new banks while the people of other States shall be permitted to establish them, the restrictions will not be worth a farthing. The banks will be established where the capital is with greater facility than where it is not.

Mr. CAMERON. Once more I will say capital will go where it can be most profitably exercised; and therefore I do not think it will go to New York or the East, but to the West, where it is most wanted.

Mr. SCHURZ. Have not New York banks and the moneyed men of the East every facility now to establish banks in the West as much as they please? Why do not they do it? What prevents a New York banker to-day from establishing a branch of his establishment in Chicago or Saint Louis or at Saint Joseph? Nothing in the world.

Mr. CAMERON. Because he can do better in New York now.

Mr. SCHURZ. Precisely; because he can do better with his bank where there is the most business, and there he remains; and for the same reason more banks will be established where there is the most business. If we complain now, I say, of the grasp of the monetary power of the East over the West and South, we shall see that grasp not weakened, but rather strengthened, by what is here proposed.

I have made these remarks in order to explode that most extraordinary notion of the Senator from Indiana, that if we only permit the establishment of more national banks in the West and South, more currency will go and stay there, because the loans and discounts of the banks will return every thirty, sixty, or ninety days; and to dispel that general and almost incomprehensible delusion, that by the establishment of such banks, under such laws as we have, the amount of loanable capital in the West or South will be increased and not diminished. Whatever results free banking under the national-bank act may have, it will certainly not produce those effects which the advocates of free banking in the Senate pretend to be working for.

But the free-banking scheme, as proposed here, must also be looked at from another point of view. It has been argued that free banking, even without any effectual system of redemption, but carried on to any extent under our national-bank act as it now stands, will not lead to inflation, but rather operate in the direction of a return to specie payments. This view has been expressed on this floor; and it is supported by one of the staunchest and ablest advocates of specie payments in the journalistic world, a journal whose opinions on such questions are always entitled to the highest respect; I mean the Chicago Tribune. I shall request the Secretary to read the article I send to him, and I call upon Senators who advocate free banking to listen to the reading, because the argument runs in their way.

Free banking does not necessarily involve currency inflation. If everybody who can deposit $100,000 in bonds at Washington is allowed to issue $90,000 in national-bank notes, this will not depreciate the currency. A paper currency is worth precisely as much as the money in which it is redeemable. The national-bank currency is redeemable in greenbacks. It is worth, then, just what greenbacks are. Now, if no more legal-tenders are set afloat, their value will remain just about what it is now. But if their value is unchanged, the national-bank notes redeemable in them will also have an unchanged value. So long, therefore, as the currency is increased by the issue of national-bank notes, and not of greenbacks, there can be no depreciation, and, consequently, no inflation—for inflation, as the term is used nowadays, signifies an increase in the volume of the currency that causes depreciation, or, as its friends put it, "makes money cheaper." Free banking would work in this way: If the banks set afloat more currency than the country could use, its value would begin to sink below that of greenbacks. As soon as this happened, the banks would be called upon to redeem in greenbacks until the superfluous part of their issue was again in their vaults. In this way depreciation below the greenback standard would be avoided, and the volume of currency would regulate itself. This is substantially the English plan. The greenbacks correspond to the Bank of England notes, and the national-bank notes to those of the English country banks. Our readers will find in the first volume of Tooke's "History of Prices" copious extracts from the testimony of English country bankers on the working of the system there, under a suspension of specie payments. This testimony shows that the amount of currency they could keep afloat varied regularly with the season of the year. During the spring and fall trade they discounted freely, but soon after, their notes were presented for redemption, until the surplus issue was again stored away in their vaults. When the Bank of England contracted its issues, theirs increased; when it increased its issues, theirs contracted. In other words, the currency issued by banks, which could legally circulate any amount whatever, contracted and expanded in precise proportion to the needs of the country. It was thoroughly elastic. Free banking would indirectly aid the resumption of specie payments in two ways. It would make it possible to contract the greenback currency without paralyzing business, because as the greenbacks were withdrawn fresh bank-notes would be issued to take their place. And, again, it would help contraction, because the new banks formed under it would have to keep their reserves in legal-tenders, and thus a good deal of the greenback currency would be withdrawn from circulation. The Congressmen who are opposing the bills for free banking on anti-inflation grounds are making a great mistake. The measure is not a compromise with the other side. It is a straightforward step towards specie payments.

Mr. SCHURZ. When I read that article I must confess that it staggered me a little at first sight; but great as my respect is for the source from which it comes, I am not able to accept that view of the case. It seems to me that the parallel run here between the issues of the Bank of England and of the country banks during the suspension of specie payments in England, on the one hand, and the legal-tender notes and the national-bank notes in this country, on the other, fails in one very essential point. The Bank of England notes at that period were virtually a legal tender. I know very well that they were not made so by the express language of the law, but to all intents and purposes they were practically so, and virtually recognized as such by law, while the country-bank notes were not. The value as currency of the latter, the country-bank notes, depended entirely on their redeemability in Bank of England notes, and on the credit of the issuing bank. The circulation of the country-bank notes was, therefore, essentially local. But our national-bank notes are virtually to all intents and purposes a legal tender, just as much as the Treasury note is. By section 23 of the national-bank act of June 3, 1864, they are made receivable in all parts of the United States in payment of taxes, and all other dues to the United States, except duties on imports, and also for all salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States, except interest on the national debt, and in redemption of the national currency. Now, sir, although they are not literally made a legal tender in the discharge of private debt, yet being received by the Government for what is due it, and being paid out by the Government for what it owes, they are practically made a legal tender for all purposes, like the greenback. They are, moreover, founded on the secure basis of Government bonds, payable, principal and interest, in gold. Their circulation is therefore not local, but national in the widest sense of the term, just like that of greenbacks. They are just as safe, and in one sense they are even more so, for they have behind them the solid foundation of a United States bond, payable in gold, and at the same time the ability to pay of the bank that issues them. It is, indeed, provided that they shall be redeemable on demand in Government legal-tender notes, but there is really, as far as I can see, no inducement for the holder of a national-bank note to convert it into a Government legal-tender, for the bank-note does just the same business, and is just as safe as the other. The breaking of the bank that issued it does not injure its value in the least.

I know very well there was a premium on Government legal-tenders as to national-bank notes during the panic. What was the cause of that premium? It was an uncalled-for, unreasonable fear of the country banks that there would be a run on them for the conversion of national-bank notes into greenbacks. But looking at it calmly, undisturbed by the wild influences of a panic, there would not be the least inducement in the world to run to a national bank in order to convert the national-bank note into a greenback. Such things may indeed take place in panics, but panics never can furnish a general rule to control the ordinary run of business.

While in England, during the suspension of specie payments, the conversion of a country-bank note into a Bank of England note meant the conversion of inferior currency into a superior, a safer, and in so far a more valuable one, the conversion here of a national-bank note into a greenback means virtually the conversion of one piece of currency into another which is just as good and no better.

In England the relation of redeemability between country-bank notes and Bank of England notes acted, therefore, somewhat like the relation of redeemability between a bank-note and specie in specie-paying times. But in this country the relation of redeemability does not act in the same way, because the two kinds of currency are in all essential particulars virtually the same. The only thing that makes them different is the provision of the national-bank act that the national bank is to lock up in its vaults a reserve in greenbacks amounting to 15 per cent., if a country bank, and 25 per cent., if a city bank, of its bank circulation.

Free banking, authorizing the issue of any amount of national-bank notes, only limited by the supply of United States bonds, would virtually permit an unrestricted issue of bank-notes without any system of practical redeemability, for the bank-notes would be only nominally redeemable in Government legal-tenders; while the two kinds of currency, being equally safe, performing the same office, and furnishing for that reason no inducement to prefer one to the other, are both equally irredeemable in fact, and form virtually one and the same system of paper money.

Suppose now that the enactment of such a free-banking law results in a large increase of national-bank circulation, what will be the effect? The Senator from Indiana says it will only make things lovely, and not disturb values at all. Let us see.

What are the causes which produce the disturbance of values through an irredeemable currency? There are two. First, lack of popular confidence in the issuer of that currency; and, secondly, the relation the quantity of the currency bears to the actual requirements of the business of the country.

The first of these causes, the lack of confidence in the issuer, operated during the war, while the stability of our Government was still in question, and hence the fact that the fluctuations of the currency went far beyond the fluctuations that would have been caused by the relation of the quantity of the currency to the actual requirements of the business of the country. That cause, lack of confidence in the issuer, has not operated since the Government showed that it could maintain itself, and also demonstrated its ability to work in the direction of a redemption of its liabilities. But, sir—and I wish the Senate to mark this—that cause will commence to operate again as soon as the quantity of the currency has increased to such an extent as to render the ability or willingness of the Government, or of the banks, ultimately to redeem their promises in public opinion doubtful.

The second cause, that is to say, the relation the quantity of currency bears to the actual requirements of the business of the country, will operate as soon as the quantity of currency in circulation is in excess of the actual requirements of business, and that effect will grow more extensive as the volume of currency is increased. And here, it seems to me, it matters very little whether the inflation of the currency be that of the legal-tender notes or the national-bank notes, only with this difference, that, as I admit, an inflation of the national-bank notes will be 25 and 15 per cent., respectively, less effective, owing to the amount of greenbacks to be locked up as bank reserves; but either kind of inflation, in my opinion, will run up the general prices of commodities, of gold among others; will stimulate speculation, and speculation will have the same effect that it had before. It will draw the currency away from the channels of legitimate business and concentrate it at the great centers under its own control, thus preparing the way for new collapses and disastrous crises. These breakdowns will be the more disastrous the greater the inflation of the currency has been.

Now, sir, I do not wish to be understood as being absolutely opposed to free banking under any circumstances. I should be inclined to vote for it if it be coupled with an effectual system of redemption. Of course redemption in specie would be the most satisfactory to me. At present redemption means practically nothing. It accomplishes only the locking up of a certain percentage of the greenbacks for a purpose which is only apparent, and which might practically be accomplished by locking up the same amount of bank-notes. Redeemability, as it now is, might become of importance only in the extreme case of violent and extensive fluctuations in the market value of our bonds, such as might be caused by the very improbable contingency of a foreign war and the consequent increase of our national debt. But now, in the ordinary run of business, redemption under our present law has no restraining influence upon the workings of our currency, except locking up a certain amount of greenbacks.

A restraining influence, however, might be imparted to it even while we are under suspension of specie payments, by establishing between the Government legal-tender and the national-bank note the same relation which in suspension times existed in England between the Bank of England note and the country-bank note there; that is to say, if we give the Government legal-tender note a sphere of action superior to that of the national-bank note. This might be done by repealing that part of the national-bank act which provides that the national-bank currency shall be a legal tender in payment of taxes and other dues to the Government; and the system of redemption might be made effectual by establishing assorting-houses at the different business centers of the country. That, I think, would increase the demand for greenbacks in contradistinction to national-bank notes. It would make the conversion of national-bank notes into greenbacks an object of desire in the ordinary run of business, and it would oblige the issue of national-bank notes, if they are to remain at par with greenbacks, to stay within the limits prescribed by the possibility of actual redemption, made effectual by the establishment of assorting-houses. I throw this out as a suggestion to be considered by Senators.

In that way I think free banking might be kept from running into inflation, and I should be inclined to vote for it. But without such a provision free banking, in my opinion, will result in inflation; and I have shown that an inflation of virtually irredeemable national-bank currency will, first, not remedy the evils which are complained of in the West and South, but rather aggravate them; will not give them a larger amount of loanable money, but seriously reduce that amount; will not destroy what has been called the banking monopoly of New England and New York, but rather confirm and strengthen that monopoly; and, secondly, if a free-banking act such as is proposed, without an effectual system of redemption, leads to the establishment of many new banks of issue as desired, it will have its effect of inflating the currency just at the centers of speculation. All the evils of inflation will inevitably follow; that is to say, violent fluctuations of values, over-speculation, and gambling on a larger scale than ever, until a new crash comes, which new crash will be the more disastrous the greater the inflation has been.

Now I desire to address a word to the Senate concerning the effect such a policy will have on the rates of interest. I said in my first speech on this subject that the inflation of an irredeemable currency will not reduce but will raise the current rates of interest; and that proposition has been questioned. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] went into a disquisition on the laws of demand and supply, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] disposed of the subject by the somewhat jocular remark that if more money were put into the market it would become cheap, just as if more horses and hogs were put into the market horses and hogs would become cheap. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that the horse and hog argument is not quite sufficient in this case. He has only shown in this instance, as in many others, that he does not appreciate the difference between capital and currency, especially between capital and an irredeemable paper currency. I shall try to make myself clear.

Why will the inflation of an irredeemable paper currency not lower but raise the rates of interest?

In the first place, in depreciating the currency, it will make a larger amount of currency necessary to perform the same transactions in business, and the aggregate amount of interest which you would have to pay for the sum you want for the same transactions would necessarily be larger. That, I think, is obvious.

In the second place, when the currency is inflated it incites speculation and gambling. This fact is so notorious that nobody questions it. Speculation and gambling, dealing in large ventures and working for very large profits, induce, and in most cases force, those engaged in them to pay high rates of interest in order to obtain the money with which to float their speculative enterprises from which they expect such large profits. As soon as speculation rules the money market, the rates of interest will therefore necessarily rise, and legitimate business, from which money is diverted by speculation, must conform itself to those high rates in order to obtain the money which it needs; and hence a general rise of rates.

But still another element comes in here to produce the same effect, and that is the element of risk. When an irredeemable currency is inflated, it depreciates in value. The capitalist who lends out money must take that contingency into consideration. He has to run what I have already called the gambling risk. Now, suppose the Senator from Indiana had $100,000 to lend out. If he were asked to lend it out, say on three months, he would have to consider whether at the time when the loan will be returned to him his $100,000 will be worth as much as it was when he lent it out. The currency being inflated and depreciation being the consequence, he will ask himself whether the paper dollar, which is, say, at 10 per cent. discount to-day, will not be at 16 per cent. discount when he gets his money back. Under ordinary circumstances, with a currency of stable value, he may be willing to lend out money say at 6 per cent. a year; but when he is exposed to the chance of losing in three months 6 per cent., or in one month 2 per cent. in the value of the money invested in the loan, then he will certainly not be willing to lend out that money at one-half of 1 per cent. a month, for the simple reason that it would be a losing business to the amount of 1½ per cent. a month. What will he do, therefore? He will in all probability not be disposed to lend out his $100,000 on three months' time at all. He will prefer to lend it out on call, in the first place, so as to be able to put his hand upon it as soon as the chances so turn that he may lose by leaving it out longer where he has put it; but even then he will want to cover his risk, and he will do that by demanding a higher rate of interest, sufficient to cover that risk. Hence it is that loans on call are preferred, and a higher rate of interest is demanded by lenders to cover the gambling risk, under the influence exercised by an irredeemable currency, which, by its fluctuations, renders the value of the money invested in a loan insecure.

Gentlemen complain that money cannot be had except on call. There is nothing surprising in this. There are, under such circumstances, two good reasons for the unwillingness of lenders to put out money otherwise than on call; they are the following: a lack of confidence in the stability of business; and, secondly, the growing depreciation of our paper money increasing the gambling risk. But if we inflate the currency still more, the premium on gold will rise still higher; and the evil complained of as to loans will not only not be remedied, but will be vastly aggravated.

The fact that at the present moment loans are comparatively easy in the money market has been referred to as contradicting this view. It does not contradict it at all. The crisis has crippled enterprise generally, and especially speculative enterprise. Speculation has had no time yet to recover and to produce its effects. Money is plenty in proportion to the present limited requirements of business, and although we have had an addition to the currency of twenty-five or twenty-six million dollars, yet much of the money that makes up that addition, and more besides, is at the present moment lying idle. The addition has not exercised its influence yet, but it will without doubt exercise that influence and produce its effect soon. Speculation is already reviving; we observe it in the very western markets in the grain trade. It is reviving in New York, as everybody sees. It is reviving rapidly. If we inflate the currency we shall have much more speculation than we had before; and with it, and with a further depreciation of our paper money, all the effects upon the rate of interest which I have stated will rapidly appear with all their oppressive consequences; and then those who clamor for inflation in order to give cheap money at low rates of interest to the people of the West and South will learn to their sorrow that an irredeemable currency is indeed not the people's money but the speculator's money, and that by extending and strengthening that pernicious system they have brought a curse and not a blessing upon those whose interests they pretend to serve.

A few days ago I received from a friend in Europe a most significant letter, to which an answer was requested. The writer is a merchant who desires to retire from business. He writes me to this effect:

> I can realize out of my business several hundred thousand dollars, and should like to invest my money at a good rate of interest. I have thought of investing it in the United States on mortgage security, which, as I am informed, bears from 8 to 10 per cent.; but I learn also that you are likely to inflate the currency in the United States, which, of course, will result in depreciation. I would now ask whether it would be safe for me to make such an investment in mortgage loans in the United States while there is a chance that your legal-tender money may depreciate so that I would lose more by the depreciation of capital invested than I would gain by the interest I might get.

I ask the Senator from Indiana what answer would he give, at this moment, to that gentleman who wants to send several hundred thousand dollars to the United States in order to invest them here?

Mr. MORTON. I will answer it after awhile, I think to your satisfaction.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will not the Senator answer it now?

Mr. MORTON. No; not now.

Mr. SCHURZ. He will probably give the same answer that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has just given in an undertone, "Write him to send it on." Let me tell Senators that we cannot very well expect foreigners to send along their money when the chances are that they will suffer loss in consequence of our own financial policy. Senators ought not to conceal from themselves that the credit of this country has most seriously suffered by the sale of stocks in Europe which have turned out to be worth far less than they were represented to be.

I consider it my first duty as a citizen of the United States, as an American, to deal fairly and honestly with the foreigner as well as with the countryman; and as an American who has the honor of the country at heart I cannot afford to induce a foreigner to invest money in a venture concerning which I have such good reason to fear that it will be a losing business. I shall tell that gentleman, "Send your money here and tell all your friends to send theirs as soon as we enter upon a policy that will be directed toward specie payments," for then I shall know that the value of the capital so invested will be safe; but I should not consider it honest advice, did I tell him to convert his gold into our paper money, as long as there is danger that the paper money might be depreciated by inflation.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust the Senator will allow me to interrupt him for a moment.

Mr. SCHURZ. Certainly; with great pleasure.

Mr. CAMERON. Does he believe he would be swindling his German friends by advising them to send their money here and invest it in mortgages upon good lands, and good houses, and good buildings here? Does he believe that all the people of this country are scoundrels, and that they want to get the money of Europe here upon dishonest and fraudulent representations?

Mr. SCHURZ. No, sir.

Mr. CAMERON. Does he not know that there is no part of the world in which money upon first mortgage upon real estate is so safe, so secure, as it is in the United States, and in every part of the United States?

Mr. SCHURZ. Yes, sir; I know all that. I know that for myself I would ask for no better security than a mortgage on real estate in the United States; but I know also, as every other Senator knows, that if I had to invest $100,000 to-day, with the prospect of an inflation of our currency, that $100,000 to be paid back to me in two or three years, when the premium on gold may not be 10 per cent. but 50 per cent., I would be likely to lose nearly one-half of my capital, however good the security might have been on which that capital was invested.

I would never hesitate to tell Europeans, "Send as much money as you can raise to aid us in developing our resources and to profit by it yourselves," as soon as our monetary system is such as to give them reasonable security that when the loans fall due they will get the same value back which they invested.

Now let me tell the Senator from Pennsylvania I was in Europe last year, and the people there have begun to understand this thing as well as we do. We must not indulge in the delusion that foreign capitalists will be eager to run the risks which a fluctuating currency imposes upon them; and nothing is more natural than that, while we have that currency, many investments of European money are withheld which otherwise we might expect. In this respect the character of our currency must necessarily inflict a very serious injury upon us.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. SCHURZ. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator from Missouri stated a special case of a German friend of his who said he had two or three hundred thousand dollars which he desired to send here to invest in mortgages. Mortgages mean the security of real estate, on which he was told he could get 8 or 10 per cent. Now I want to confine the Senator to that special case. I do not believe any security in the world can be better than that, and no citizen of the United States, no subject of Great Britain, or of any other country in the world that sends his money here and invests it upon an honest mortgage, has ever lost a cent; and if he can get 8 or 10 per cent., it is twice as much as he could get in Germany or in any other country of the Old World. I want the Senator to confine himself to that case, because I do not want the credit of my country destroyed by representations coming from a Senator so distinguished as the Senator from Missouri is, and so ably and so largely connected as he is in Europe.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator wants me to confine myself to that one case, and I should desire nothing better. Here is a man who asks me, "Can I, at the present moment, send over several hundred thousand dollars to be invested in mortgage securities in the United States, with safety as to the value of my capital, while you have a fluctuating, irredeemable paper money?" That gentleman wants to profit by the rates of interest here prevailing; but above all things he wants to have the value of his capital secured. He will not distrust the mortgage, but he wants to know whether, when the debt falls due, the same number of paper dollars returned to him will be worth in gold as much as they were when he made the loan or mortgage.

Mr. CAMERON. The increase of real estate is always equal to any depreciation of the currency.

Mr. SCHURZ. But, sir, the increase of real estate in value does not increase the amount of the mortgage, as the Senator knows, just as well as every child in the country knows it. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) Order!

Mr. SCHURZ. And, therefore, I say so long as the foreign investor cannot be sure that he will have returned to him the same amount of capital he will not invest. It is useless for gentlemen to close their eyes to this fact. It is one of the results springing from our irredeemable paper money. It is so, and it cannot be otherwise. If the Senator is answered, and I think he is——

Mr. CAMERON. I do not think I am answered at all; but I shall not interfere for the present with the Senator.

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator wants to put another question to me, I shall be very ready to answer it.

Mr. CAMERON. I am ready to say that the Senator has not answered my question at all. The special proposition was that these people expected to put their money in mortgages on real estate. I say that no one who has ever invested upon a first mortgage on property at current rates in this country has ever lost by the investment.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator cannot have so completely misunderstood me as to think that I expressed the least doubt of the safety of mortgages in the United States. If I were worth $10,000,000 and had it all to invest in loans, I would ask for no better security than mortgages on real estate in the United States. The question is this: whether a man investing a certain sum in mortgages, when he retires his capital two or three years hence, will not by the depreciation of the currency lose 20 or 30 or 40 per cent. of the value of his capital; whether the dollar that he invests now will be worth just as much when that dollar will be returned to him? That is the question.

Mr. CAMERON. I say yes; and I ask the Senator this question: does he believe that any man who invested $300,000 in Saint Louis for three years could have lost by it, or has lost by it, under any circumstances?

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator from Pennsylvania is an old financier and a very successful one. He certainly knows that when an irredeemable currency is inflated, the effect will be its depreciation; that when he to-day can buy a dollar in gold for $1.12 in currency, if we expand the currency at the rate of $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 more, he will have to pay $1.25 or $1.30 in currency for a dollar in gold. In other words, while a dollar in currency may be worth eighty-eight cents in gold, if we inflate the currency it may be worth then seventy-five or seventy or sixty cents; and, old and successful financier as the Senator is, he is too world-wise not to understand that when I invest eighty cents and get only sixty cents back, I shall be a loser by twenty cents. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is any more disorder in the galleries the Chair will order them to be cleared.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I am too old and too wise to allow the Senator from Missouri to get me off the subject I started upon. I shall not contend in words with him. He can beat me there a thousand to one. But I bring him down to his assertion that he could not afford to allow his foreign friends to come here and invest money upon mortgage. I say he was wrong in that; he was depreciating the credit of the country and doing a wrong to the country which has adopted him and honored him.

Mr. SCHURZ. There are other persons, I fear, who are depreciating the credit of the country. They are those who want to continue a money system which introduces into all transactions of business the element of chance and deception; a money system which by that deception injures not only the foreigner who may invest his funds here, but our own people; a system of irredeemable paper money which has time and again fallen under the contempt of civilized mankind. Those, I say, are depreciating the credit of the country who in the very midst of the nineteenth century, with all the lights of universal experience around them, still strive to maintain, to confirm, and to perpetuate a disgrace like that. I tell the Senator from Pennsylvania I can think of nothing that would be better calculated to elevate the American character and to raise the credit of the country in the eyes of the world than a speedy deliverance from that system. Why is it, I would ask him, that the national bonds of ours, than which there is no better security in the world, do not rise higher than they have done? Why is it that they do not keep pace, in proportion to the respective rates of interest, with the best of European securities? Simply because as long as we have this false system of irredeemable money, there is still lurking in the minds of men a secret suspicion that, by some trick or other, the national debt may still be paid off with depreciated greenbacks; and when I say that, I know whereof I speak, for I heard it a hundred times, to my own shame and to that of my country. I know that suspicion is wrong, absolutely groundless; but I consider it my duty, as a candid man, to tell you that such a suspicion exists.

I have now indicated how the credit of the country can be raised and how it is depreciated.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator will allow me, he is again wrong, in my estimation. It is not because of the doubt of our credit, or our honesty, but it is because of that natural feeling in the human mind that men trust those securities that are near to them. The small money-lender in Germany will lend to a man in his own ward for less interest than he will to a man living a mile off from him in the same city. So the people of France lend their money, and so do the people of England lend it at home first. It is the surplus, which they cannot invest securely, that they send here. Besides, if he wants to make his mortgage secure, it is very easy to make the interest payable in gold.

Mr. SCHURZ. Ah! there we come to it. Let us make it all payable in gold; that is what we are contending for.

Mr. CAMERON. The difference between the Senator and me is, that he distrusts the integrity of the American people. I believe that the people of the United States are just as honest as any other people in the world, and I know that they have paid their debts as honestly as any other people in the world ever paid theirs.

Mr. SCHURZ. When the Senator from Pennsylvania says that I have said anything to their discredit, or reflected upon the honesty of the American people, he says that which he ought to know is not correct. I have said nothing of the kind.

Mr. CAMERON. I only take your words.

Mr. SCHURZ. I have not used such words. I have said that an irredeemable currency is a dishonest money system. It has been stigmatized as such by the history of the world.

Mr. CAMERON. But you talked about trickery in its payment.

Mr. SCHURZ. I said this: that if we inflate the currency, the value of money will be depreciated. Is the Senator from Pennsylvania the man to deny it? Does he not know it just as well as I do? Is he not too well versed in addition and subtraction not to know that?

But there was one remark which fell from the Senator from Pennsylvania which really surprised me. He said that the people of Europe took hold of only such loans as were made in their immediate neighborhood. Has he forgotten that during our war hundreds of millions of our bonds went into Germany, and were readily taken there, while the destinies of the United States were still trembling in the scale of battle? Has he forgotten that? Does he not know that the European countries have been fairly flooded with our railroad securities? Can he count the millions of capital that came from Europe, with which so many of our enterprises were floated, that could not find ready and sufficient capital at home?

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator will not represent me fairly. I said that the people of Europe sent their money here after they had invested all they could profitably at home. They send it for profit. I say that the people in the immediate neighborhood in a single city would lend their money more readily to their neighbors than they would to others at a distance; and he knows that a man living in Saint Louis to-day would rather lend money at a less interest to people in Saint Louis than he would to a man in Pennsylvania of whom he knew nothing. But the Senator beats me in words, and I give up.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think it is indeed useless to quarrel about trifles.

Mr. CAMERON. I have too much respect for you to quarrel with you.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to recall to my friend's mind a fact that is known to me, and no doubt known to him, that on account of the uncertainty of the value of our paper money, its constant appreciation and depreciation, nine-tenths, perhaps ninety-nine one-hundredths, of all the loans now made in Europe to this country, both principal and interest, are required to be paid in gold.

Mr. SCHURZ. It is a fact as notorious as sunlight; and therefore I express my surprise that so old a financier as the Senator from Pennsylvania should question it in the least.

But now, sir, to return from this digression; and I hope no Senator can have so grossly misconstrued me as to believe that I ever thought of questioning the honesty of the American character, for I have it more at heart than those who advocate the inflation of the currency. I will now say a word about the general law governing the rate of interest.

The rate of interest—and I desire to impress this especially on those of my southern friends who the other day asserted that if we could only furnish currency enough the rate of interest would become as low, I think it was in Georgia, as it is in London. The rate of interest at any given point is regulated by the proportion of the amount of loanable capital existing or attainable to the demand for the use of that capital. Loanable capital is that which persons possess beyond the amount used by themselves in production. Where the amount of loanable capital is large, there the rate of interest will be low; and where the amount of loanable capital is small, there the rate of interest will be high. But loanable capital is the accumulation of surplus earnings. It is therefore the growth of time. Hence in communities where production, labor, and the accumulation of surplus earnings have gone on but a short time, or where such accumulation has been destroyed, as by war, the rates of interest are high, and will remain so until the necessary accumulation to lowert hem is effected.

The other day I received a letter from Omaha, in Nebraska, complaining very much that interest ranges there at 12 to 24 per cent., while in Boston and New York, as the letter stated, it ranged only from 6 to 8. That is undoubtedly true. In New York and Boston we can hear exactly the same complaint, that interest ranges there from 6 to 8 per cent., while in London and Amsterdam it ranges from 2 to 3; and the reason of the difference between Omaha and Boston, and between Boston and Amsterdam, is exactly the same. In London and Amsterdam there are large accumulations of loanable capital; centuries have been spent in piling it up; larger accumulations of loanable capital than in New York and Boston. And in New York and Boston there are larger accumulations of loanable capital, also the growth of centuries, than in Omaha in Nebraska, or in Hannibal in Missouri. Now, if we could transport the accumulation of wealth and give it the same field of action existing in Amsterdam and London bodily to New York and Boston, then the rate of interest at the latter places would not be any longer 6 and 8 per cent., but it would be 2 to 3 per cent.; and if we could transport all the accumulated wealth of New York and Boston to Omaha and Hannibal, then, in all probability, the rate of interest there would cease to be 12 to 24 per cent., and it would range at 6 to 8.

But the same effect cannot be produced any other way than by the gradual creation and accumulation of wealth. The accumulation of capital and consequent low rates of interest are the result of the work of generations. It cannot be created by the establishment of banks, or by the issues of paper money; and the idea that it can be done by the printing of irredeemable paper money is so absurd, that every baby can see it. Still more preposterous is the fabulous notion that we can issue paper money enough to secure to everybody who wants it a loan, or to discount every man's note at as low a rate of interest as he desires. It is indeed incredible that such propositions should be seriously advanced and advocated on the floor of the Senate of the United States. Why, we might as well in the shortest way solve the problem by saying, "Let every man issue his note for all his debts, past, present, and prospective;" and then let us enact a law making that note legal-tender. [Laughter.]

And now, sir, when I have demonstrated by fact and reason, so that every child might understand them, propositions like these, that capital and currency are two very different things; that the wealth of a country is not augmented by printing more paper money; that when popular confidence in the issuer of irredeemable paper money is unimpaired, the constant depreciation of that paper money demonstrates its excess in quantity over and above the real requirements of legitimate business; that such a currency may in the aggregate be superabundant and yet an insufficiency may be felt in certain localities and certain branches of business in consequence of a vicious diffusion; that this vicious diffusion, springing in part from the natural effects of an irredeemable and redundant currency, cannot be cured but will only be aggravated by inflation; that the gambling risk inseparable from an irredeemable and fluctuating currency will drive up prices as well as the rates of interest; that the rate of interest depends on the existing amount of real capital in a loanable form and its proportion to the demand for the use of that capital, and can therefore not be lowered by an inflation of an irredeemable currency, but will be raised by the increased element of risk; that for such reasons the remedies for existing evils proposed by gentlemen who favor inflation are not only no real remedies at all, but mere quack medicines, which will only aggravate the ailment; when all this is demonstrated, gentlemen on the opposite side mount the high horse and say, "Why, all this is mere theory; you are mere abstractionists. We are practical men, which you are not; you look into books, but we look into the living, active business of the country; we trust the evidences of our senses; we open our eyes, and we see what is going on, and from what we see we draw our conclusions, and upon what we see we build our ideas as to remedies." Well, sir, the contempt of these practical statesmen for theories is of the very loftiest nature. I have heard it said on this floor that the great lights of political economy, such as Adam Smith, John Stuart Mill, Ricardo, and all those who recognized the precious metals as the standard of value, and who thought they would remain so, were in fact nothing but old fogies, rather behind their times; moral cowards, who had not courage enough to confront an old popular prejudice. Away, then, with all those great thinkers upon whom the world has so long looked with pride; away with Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill and Ricardo and Bonamy Price. Away, also, with our own Thomas Jefferson and Hamilton and Gallatin and Crawford. We have now among us a new school of political economists who know better. With the Senator from Indiana, they exclaim, "Throw theory to the dogs," as he said the other day; and it must be admitted they have thrown theory to the dogs most effectually. They rely upon nothing but the evidence of their senses, and how can that lead them astray? Well, sir, in this respect they are, however, not quite original.

Some ten or eleven years ago, during the war, I met in the South an old farmer who was called by his neighbors "Old Tatum." He was a practical philosopher of the same kind, who relied upon nothing but the evidence of his senses; and inasmuch as he could but with difficulty spell out a word or two in large print, he had a lofty contempt for book-learning. I liked to talk with the old man, and once in conversation I happened to say something about the earth moving around the sun. "Hold on," said old Tatum; "what did you say there? The earth moving around the sun! Where did you get that?" "Well," I said, "I got it from the books." "There again," cried old Tatum, and he would fairly roll over with laughter—"there again, from the books. The earth moving around the sun! And don't I see every day with these, my own eyes, the sun moving around the earth? [Laughter.] Don't I see it rise there in the morning, and don't I see it go down yonder every evening? Ah," said he, "you book-men can't fool old Tatum." [Laughter.]

What a shining light old Tatum would have been among the new school of political economists here! [Laughter.] Would he not have thrown theory to the dogs like the very best of them? "Here I see a difficulty," old Tatum would say; "there are many persons in the United States who want money; the difficulty is, of course, there is not money enough to go around. What is to be done? Inasmuch as we make money by printing it, let us print more until it will go around." But you may say, "Mr. Tatum——

Mr. CAMERON. Was not Tatum a hard-money man?

Mr. SCHURZ. No; unfortunately he was not. I will show the Senator what he was; and, in fact, the Senator himself has heard him quite frequently.

You might say, "Mr. Tatum, these bits of money are not proper money at all; they are promises to pay money; and the more you print of them the less they will be worth, and the less they are worth the less you can do with them in business; you cannot make the country rich in that way." Such talk would not trouble old Tatum at all. He would laugh right in your face. "Do we not call these paper notes dollars?" old Tatum would say. "Are they not dollars? Cannot I read it with my spectacles in big print upon them, 'one dollar,' 'ten dollars,' 'one hundred dollars?' and is not the country better off when it has fifteen hundred millions of these dollars than when it has only seven hundred and fifty millions of them? Ah, you can't fool old Tatum, I tell you." [Laughter.]

Neither would the question of interest give old Tatum the least trouble in the world. He would settle it with the same ease with which the Senator from Indiana settled it the other day. He would say "Money is capital; do you not call it so? And these paper dollars are money; do we not call them so; therefore these paper dollars are capital. Must not everybody see that?" You see old Tatum is a logician. "Now," old Tatum would continue," "when these paper dollars are plenty, then capital is cheap, and you can hire it at a low rate of interest; when these paper dollars are scarce, then, of course," he would say, "capital is dear and you would have to pay much more for it." So you cannot fool old Tatum. "Do I not know that when you put more hogs and horses in the market, horses and hogs get cheaper?" [Laughter.] Thus you see old Tatum would be as good at the horse and hog argument as anybody. [Laughter.] Old Tatum is eminently a practical statesman.

But I suspect after all, sir, that there is something in that theory that the earth moves around the sun, although old Tatum has never been able to see it. And I suspect there is after all something in the principles of political economy, in that science of finance, which is the accumulated wisdom and experience of many centuries, although the practical statesmen of the old Tatum school cannot see it and are ready to throw it to the dogs. Throw it to the dogs, Senators, and I fear the honor as well as the prosperity of the country will soon go the same way.

When all other resources fail, when even a contemptuous sneer at book-learning and theory will no longer answer, the advocates of inflation grow fearfully pathetic in calling the opponents of their fallacious doctrines enemies of the poor, supporters of the rich, friends of the oppressors, of the money-changer, of the wicked speculator, and so on. Ah, sir, the Lord may forgive those who know not what they are doing.

Is, then, the inflation of irredeemable paper money really a help to the poor? Can it be? Can any sensible man pretend for a moment that it can be? It has been well said here that the rich man is always able to take care of his interests; and so he is. He can provide for his own welfare, whatever the vicissitudes of trade and the fluctuations of values may be, for he has the means to take advantage of every change. Is the currency inflated and does it depreciate? He speculates upon a rise of prices. Is the movement in the opposite direction? He speculates upon their fall. He stands upon that eminence where he can see the storm coming and discern in what direction it will blow. He can bend before it and rise up when it is over. He can watch his chances, and he has the means to turn them to his advantage. He commands the situation, and can take care not to become its victim; and he covers his risks by making the poor man pay their cost; for the poor man, living from hand to mouth on his daily earnings, is the slave of his necessities. The vicissitudes of the great business world overtake him unawares, for he has not the opportunity to watch the workings of hidden forces; and even if he had that opportunity, what means would he have to avail himself of this knowledge; what means to provide for the changes of fortune? He cannot, amid the fluctuations of values, speculate on a rise or on a fall, for what he receives for his labor he has to use at once just as he receives it, for bread to feed his family, or for clothing to cover them, or if he saves anything, his savings may depreciate in his own hand while that hand holds them, small as they are; and what means has he to make up for the loss? His savings are too small for speculative operation.

The great steamer of five thousand tons may defy the storm and break her course through the angriest sea with scarcely impeded strength, but the poor fisherman's boat is helpless against the gale, and without resistance dashed upon the rocks by overpowering waves. The poor man is the helpless victim, and nothing but the victim, of that tricky game which a fluctuating paper money enables the rich to play with the poor man's fortunes.

You speak of the distress of those who this day are without work and without bread. What has caused that distress? It was caused by a crisis, a collapse of speculation, grown up under the auspices of that same paper-money system which you now strive to confirm and strengthen in all its iniquitous influences, to bring on other crashes and collapses; and who will be the man to be ground to powder by them? The poor man, not the rich. What is it that rises last when your paper system drives up prices? The laboring man's wages. What is it that drops first when your bubbles of paper speculation burst? The poor man's earnings. You speak of reviving confidence, and, with confidence, enterprise, by new issues of paper money, and yet that very confidence has been destroyed by the very agency of that paper money; and confidence does not revive to-day for fear of new fluctuations and new uncertainties.

You talk of debtors and creditors, debtors being benefited by inflation, and creditors by the resumption of specie payments. Let me ask you, who are the debtors, and who are the creditors of this country? Let every Senator look into his own household; who are the creditors, and who are the debtors there? There is but one man in that household who is able to be a debtor, and that is the Senator himself. Not his servants; for they have not credit enough to contract debts. If they are anything they are creditors, however small the amount may be. Look at the savings-banks of this country, and what do you see there? Seven hundred and sixty million dollars of deposits. Who are the depositors? Not the rich, but the poor man, who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow; the man of small means, who puts there for safe-keeping his small surplus earnings. The same class have in national and State banks, and in trust companies, as has been estimated by good authority, two hundred millions more; and another two hundred and fifty millions are owing to the same class in the shape of unpaid wages and other debts. There are twelve hundred millions, then—twelve hundred millions of debt—owing to the laboring men and the men of small means. And now, I ask you who are advocating the inflation of the currency, what are you doing to those poor people; what are you doing with their twelve hundred millions of money? Inflate the currency, and by inflation depreciate it, and you will diminish the value of these twelve hundred millions 10, 20, 30 per cent. And now boast of being the friends of the poor while you advocate a policy that will rob the poor in the land of so large a proportion of their hard-earned property.

When looking at the scheme advocated here to relieve distress and to revive prosperity, one might almost believe that gentlemen with the most serious faces were carrying on a game of cruel mockery with those who look up to us for guidance and aid. If they ask for bread, I entreat Senators do not give them a stone! If you do not know how to aid them, at least do not deceive them; do not impose upon their credulity by offering to them as a remedy for their ills the continuance and extension of a money system which, wherever it has been tried, has always turned all social and economic movements into a mere game of chance and overreaching, in which always those lose most who have least to lose.

But we are told again and again that the people are demanding inflation, and the Senator from Indiana never grows tired of saying that he thinks his people think they understand this business, and they want inflation and nothing else.

But when you tell me that the American people want inflation, I boldly deny it. The American people are an enlightened and an honest people, and if for a little while they may be led astray by a taking catchword, they will soon recover their sound senses and show that they know what is honest as well as what is prudent. I have seen and heard this kind of thing before.

About seven or eight years ago some politicians thought it would be a very popular idea to repudiate our duty to pay the national bonds in gold; they proposed to issue the necessary amount of greenbacks to pay off the national debt in a depreciated paper, in the cheapest possible money. They thought the people would jump at the chance of thus getting rid of a very onerous burden. Well, sir, what was the result? At first the proposition seemed to become quite popular in some quarters, and politicians of both parties—who are always ready to run after a popular cry, right or wrong, and always think what they think the people think—saw there a chance of a profitable game for themselves. They advocated the scheme, or at least did nothing against it. They thought they could not afford to oppose it. Well, sir, here is a piece of my personal experience. In the presidential campaign of 1868 I was invited to make speeches in the State of Indiana. When I came into that State I was met by some politicians who told me, "O, now we want you not to say anything in your speeches against that greenback scheme; the people of Indiana are almost universally in favor of it; they want to get rid of this heavy debt; they do not want to pay the bloated bondholder in gold;" and so on. I replied, "If I cannot say about the greenback scheme what I please in this canvass, I will not speak in Indiana at all." After some hesitation those politicians consented that I should proceed; but they watched me with great trepidation. Well, I did speak my mind, and in every speech I denounced the greenback scheme as a most rascally conception, and I insisted that it was the sacred duty of the Government to pay to the national creditor every farthing according to the letter and spirit of the law. And there were the people of Indiana before me, who had been represented to me as being fairly wild on the subject of the greenback scheme. What was the result? No declaration in my speeches was more heartily applauded than just this, and that applause came from the same people whom weak-kneed politicians had represented to me as all on fire for repudiation. And the same politicians have to thank their fate if their people have consented to forget the abandonment of honest principles they were guilty of.

Ah, sir, those miscalculate their chances who think they can safely speculate upon the rascally instincts of the American people.

The inflation cry will go the same way the repudiation cry has gone. I am convinced the inflation cry will be one of the most short-lived cries this country ever heard; and I am not much mistaken when I say that those who advocate inflation in this body must make hot haste to commit the Senate to that iniquitous doctrine, or the last semblance of popular support will drop away before the decision is reached. No, sir; it is not the people, it is the speculators and their deluded victims, who are continually dinning the cry of inflation into our ears, and so it will become manifest to every one who has eyes to see and ears to hear.

It has frequently been asserted that every native-born American citizen is apt to think of becoming at some time or other a candidate for the Presidency. Permit me to say that if any possible presidential candidate indulges in the delusion that he can ride into the White House on the inflation cry, he will meet with the same disappointment that overtook those who seven or eight years ago thought the repudiation cry a good thing for the same purpose. If public men who advocate the inflation policy should, unfortunately for themselves and for the country, prevail in this Congress, let them not indulge in the delusion that they will secure the favor of the people by a short spell of deceptive prosperity, for I tell you the bubble may just have time to burst before the year 1876. For their own as well as their country's good, I entreat Senators on the opposite side to stop and consider well before they irrevocably associate their names with a policy which stands already condemned by the universal experience of civilized mankind, and a new trial of which in this country would not only bring disaster and ruin upon us, but cast shame upon the American name. Yes, sir; I say it would cast shame upon the American name, for the American people will in the eyes of the world most seriously impair their credit for intelligence, to speak of nothing else, if, with open eyes, with all the warnings of history before them, they repeat a blunder which, as often as it has been made, has always resulted in private misfortune and in national disgrace.

Now, Mr. President, I am done. I said at the outset that the object of my remarks would be to show that those who advocate inflation seriously mistake the nature of the difficulties they want to provide against, and that the remedies they propose will not only not cure but will aggravate the evil. That is what I have attempted to do; nothing more. Let me hope that my remarks will not be entirely without influence upon the vote of the Senate touching the proposition before us. The other branches of this great subject—and I know there are many which I have not even alluded to—I will leave for further discussion when we shall have a matured bill before us embracing our whole financial system.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, at the close of a long debate, running through some two months, when we thought we were about to vote, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] comes forward with a carefully prepared written speech, which has evidently been weeks in preparation. Of course I cannot reply to that speech point by point to-day, at this late hour, a speech that has taken some three hours in its delivery; but I think I may characterize it justly by saying that, taking it all together, it is an exaggeration.

The Senator undertakes to become funny, if I may use the word, in talking about works on political economy. He says that I have derided works on political economy and have derided theory. I have not done so. I have derided the attempt to apply theories where they were not applicable, to make use of particular doctrines where they did not apply, and that is all.

Mr. President, the cheapest of all political learning is that which is obtained by cramming from works on political economy. I have known a man who knew very little of politics get four or five old speeches, cram out of them for two or three days, and then go on the stump and make a flaming political oration; and I have known a man who had very superficial knowledge on any subject cram out of works on political economy, and then prepare an address which, to the uninformed, would perhaps seem to be exceedingly learned.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] the other day stated the true doctrine upon this subject. He said the doctrines of political economy were not cosmopolitan, but were national, and that the same doctrine would not suit a nation at all times, and that the doctrine that would suit one nation might not suit another; and I have said, and I may say here, that those doctrines drawn from the experience of old and of small countries are not adapted to a country like ours, that is growing and developing and is now but in its youth. The Senator from Missouri has attempted to apply those doctrines. He seems not to comprehend the country in which he lives or the times in which he lives. The Senator is what they call in France a doctrinaire, a political littérateur; he takes his learning from the books that are as available for me or any other member of the Senate as for himself; and when he assumes (because he has assumed that in substance) that he has studied these books and that others have not, perhaps he is mistaken. It may be that even I have paid as much attention to some of those works as he has, and in times past have been as much fascinated by them; but I have learned to understand, as I believe, that the doctrines of political economy cannot be applied to all countries under all circumstances.

Sir, there are four of those doctrines that may be called the Weird Sisters, that go hand in hand: first, the doctrine of free trade; then a small volume of currency; then low wages; and then direct taxation. On a former occasion the Senator made an argument in favor of contraction of the currency as being the true way to return to specie payments. That argument has disappeared to-day. The Senator has learned something, or he has forgotten something, since the 16th of January, when he made that argument. He then argued that a small volume of currency was as good for the country as a large one; that the purchasing power of money would be just the same, and that the way to come to specie payments was by contraction. The Senator has dropped that out to-day. He has found that the doctrine of contraction does not suit this country or this people, and now he talks about resumption in a general way, without telling us how we are to come to it; and he talks about our system of currency being a dishonest one. Sir, it is not dishonest. It is an honest one, that was adopted for a good and honest purpose, and it has saved this country.

And now I want to answer a question that the Senator asked me a little while ago. He said that some gentleman had written to him from Germany whether he should send his money here to invest it. I did not understand the answer the Senator sent back to his friend. What was your answer?

Mr. SCHURZ. I did not say that I had returned any answer at all yet, because I have not; but I am going to, and I will tell you what I am going to write. I will tell that gentleman——

Mr. MORTON. I am not asking what you are going to write, but what you have written.

Mr. SCHURZ. It might as well be said now, because otherwise I might have to tell the Senator after I had written it.

Mr. MORTON. Very well. I will hear it.

Mr. SCHURZ. I am going to write this: As long as there is any danger of inflation in this country, which would depreciate the currency and put you in a condition not to have a return of the full value of the investment you have made, you had better wait. As soon as you see that we turn in the direction of specie payments, on a gold basis again, then do not only send your own money, but get all your friends to do the same, pile it up mountain-high; we cannot get too much.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator's friend will be highly informed when he gets that answer. He will know just exactly what to do; will he not? [Laughter.] If he advises his friend not to send his money here, it only proves that he does not understand this country; he does not comprehend the times in which he lives. If he seriously supposes that this Congress or any member of this Congress is going to propose anything that will endanger a loan of money on the part of any European, he does not understand the country any better than he does that of China, from the history of which he quoted.

Mr. SCHURZ. Do I interrupt the Senator at this point?

Mr. MORTON. The Senator has had his three hours, and I must insist that he allow me a few minutes. I only want to take a few minutes.

Mr. SCHURZ. I certainly do not want to interrupt the Senator, unless when I am misapprehended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Senator from Indiana declines to yield.

Mr. SCHURZ. All right.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator understands this country at all he must know, however we may differ about the propriety of increasing the volume of national-bank circulation forty or fifty millions, that it is perfectly safe for the capital of Europe to come here. When he hesitates to say so, it only shows that he understands words, and perhaps books, but is ignorant of the country in which he lives and which has done him honor.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator has talked much about paper money; he has talked about the theory of John Law, about paper money in China a thousand years ago. The Senator does not comprehend what he is talking about, it seems to me, at all, when he compares the national-bank currency secured by the bonds of the United States—bonds that command a premium in gold—with the paper issued by the banks of John Law, without security or capital or limit; when he compares it to the French paper issued by a revolutionary government in 1789, and from that time forward, until it became so abundant that they could paper their houses with it. I say, when he compares the two things, he shows an utter confusion of ideas. It may all be very funny and very rhetorical, but it shows that he utterly fails to comprehend the country or the times.

Mr. SCHURZ. I have not talked so.

Mr. MORTON. Why, Mr. President, what is our currency? Three hundred and seventy-seven million dollars of legal-tender notes. Does anybody doubt but that the Government is able to take care of those notes, and that it will when the time comes?

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the time ever come?

Mr. MORTON. My friend from Ohio suggests that the time will never come. Why does he say that? Because the time is not now, to-day, he argues it never will come.

And then we have $354,000,000 of national-bank notes secured by the bonds of the United States, and redeemable on demand in legal-tender notes; and now what is our proposition? Some of us are in favor of free banking; that is, to enable every locality in the West and South that wants a national bank to have it. I do not believe that will increase the volume of national-bank notes more than fifty or sixty millions. Others are in favor of a fixed amount, say $46,000,000 of an increase, so as to make the whole volume of national-bank notes $400,000,000. If we allow the $44,000,000 reserve to go into circulation, making the whole number of legal-tender notes $400,000,000, and then increase the volume of national-bank notes up to $400,000,000, we shall have an even $800,000,000; and the question now comes up, is that too large a volume of currency for this country? We are answered by the parrot-like cry, "irredeemable paper;" by the word, "inflation."

Now, can it be said that the present volume of currency is just the volume we need? Who can say that? We have much less currency than we had in 1866; we have less than we had in 1868; we have less than we had in 1870; and the increase in population and wealth has been going on rapidly. Some of us think this natural increase of the wealth and population demands an increase of currency of forty or fifty million dollars; that currency is used for business, and that as business increases the currency ought to increase, it being the means of doing that business. That is our argument. But because we say that, we are called inflationists, and the followers of John Law; and the Senator went on to tell us about China. Why, he said, they once had paper money in China a thousand years ago; but he said a thousand years ago the idea of paper money in China was exploded. Yes; and about that time they built a wall about China, and China was finished a thousand years ago. There has been no progress there; and I undertake to say that if the theories could be adopted that are advocated on this floor we should for years be a finished country.

The Senator talks about speculation. He says an irredeemable currency begets speculation. Is that true? Is it because the currency is irredeemable? There is no foundation for that in fact or in argument. I say that an abundance of money begets speculation, whether that money is irredeemable or whether it is gold and silver. I refer the Senator to his own country. The gold of France has been emptied into the lap of Germany; and because of that gold they have had such speculation in stocks and in everything in Germany as they never had before. It was not because the currency of Germany was irredeemable, but it was because they had a superabundance of gold and silver. That was what made the speculation. Speculation does not flow from currency because it is irredeemable, but it flows from an abundance of money.

Now I want to say one word about speculation. Is speculation the worst thing in the world? Speculation in stocks is a bad thing, but it takes place in all countries. The greatest speculation that ever took place in stocks happened in England on the specie basis in their railroad securities. We have had the wildest speculation on the different bourses in Europe when they have had a currency redeemable in gold. Speculation in stocks does not depend on the character of the currency. Stocks beget speculation; and wherever they have stock markets, there they have speculation. But we are pointed to the stock market of New York, as if that was the result of irredeemable paper. The Senator says he is right from Europe; he was there last year, and he brings us word back from Germany. If he was there last year he ought to know that they had such wild and furious speculation in Berlin in stocks and real estate, and everything else, as they never had before, while their currency was overflowing with gold, or paper redeemable with gold; and yet he talks here as if speculation was the result only of irredeemable paper.

I want to speak for a moment about the article from the Chicago Tribune. The Senator read an article from the Chicago Tribune to this effect: that free banking does not inflate the currency; that free banking would not depreciate the value of the greenbacks but increase their value, because it would make an increased demand for them; and because, as the article says, every paper is worth just what it is redeemed in; and as long as the national-bank notes have to be redeemed in greenbacks, and you do not increase the greenbacks, you do not depreciate the currency by increasing the national-bank notes. The Senator read the article, and could not answer it; and if he was to argue a month he cannot answer it. It so happens that that argument was made on the floor of the Senate before it appeared in the Chicago Tribune; but when the Senator saw it in a newspaper he said it staggered him. The Senator has had too much confidence in newspapers for a good while. Two or three years ago there was a syndicate of great newspapers, and the Senator thought they were sufficient to overturn the republican party and the democratic party, and establish a new party upon the ruins of both; and like wanton boys that swim on bladders, the Senator ventured out into what he thought was a sea of glory; but the bladders suddenly bursted, and the Senator was badly worsted in the encounter. [Laughter.]

The Senator himself, strange to say, comes around and indorses substantially the system of free banking. He said if there could be offices to assort their bills and send them back to the issuing banks, he would be willing to vote for free banking himself. I should not have much objection to that. I myself want some reforms in the national banking system. I want the national banks required to keep their reserves at home, not to send them to New York; and if you can improve the means by which the national banks are made to redeem their own notes in greenbacks, I should have no objection, and the Senator admits that upon that ground he would be in favor of free banking himself. His objection to irredeemable paper suddenly disappears, and he is willing to have banks and bank-notes multiplied; but this is a part of the confusion of ideas that prevails throughout the speech.

According to his argument the West has been injured by the establishment of national banks. According to his argument it is better for all the banks to be in the East, and the West to have none. Now, what is that argument? He says that when the people in the West want to establish a national bank they must first take $120,000 in money and go to New York and buy their bonds; that much money is taken out of the West and taken to the East; and then they get $90,000 of the par value of the bonds in currency. That is true. Therefore he says there are $120,000 gone from the West to the East, and the West is poorer by the difference between that sum and $90,000. He had argued just before that currency would flow, like water down hill, to where it was most needed; no difference where you started, it would go to the place where it was wanted. Now, if $120,000 is taken from a town in the West to the East to buy bonds, when the money is paid out in New York for the bonds, according to the theory, the money will flow back to the West, where it is wanted. But in addition to that they will get $90,000 of advance in the way of bills on their bonds. He tells you it does not make a bit of difference where the banks are located; you may concentrate them all in Washington; the currency will go where it is required, if it is West, East, North, or South. Then when the currency is taken out of the West to buy bonds, according to his own argument it will flow back just as it is required. But now comes the advantage. When you establish a bank in the city of Saint Louis, with a circulation of $500,000, that circulation gets into public use only as a loan; and that amount has to come back to Saint Louis every few days or months in payment of that loan, and the $500,000 is there to loan again. If the bank is located in Washington, then the $500,000 comes back here, and if anybody wants to borrow the money, he must come to Washington to get it. Yet in the face of this, we are told it makes no difference where the banks are located. It seems to me that this is taxing the patience of sensible people very much.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Indiana, before passing the point he was discussing, allow me, as he has overlooked them, to make two suggestions on this point? The law now restricting banking, so that it cannot exist except by an extension, prohibits the capital that the Senator has been speaking of, that is in the East, going into the West or South for banking purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all; it does not prevent it going anywhere.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that; but the law restricts us to the banking circulation itself. There is no way to get circulation in the West or in the South under this banking law, that is what I am speaking of, but by opening it to capital. I do not speak of banks, but capital must be invited there upon which bank circulation will be issued.

Mr. MORTON. The argument made by the Senator from Missouri seems to proceed in total ignorance of the way banks are got up. How is a bank got up, if you please, in the city of Indianapolis? The men who want to start it go around with a subscription paper; get a mechanic to put down $1,000, a merchant to put down $2,000, another man $5,000, another man $500. They take it out of their business. That money was not loaned before; it was used in some other way. In that way they organize a bank, and the 90 per cent. comes back there as available funds to be loaned. That is the way banks are organized. In addition to that, the people have the advantage of bank credits; they have the advantage of bank-checks; they have all those facilities that stand in the place of currency. But the Senator insults the entire West and South when he says they do not know what is good for them, and that these banks might just as well be in the East as to be in the West; and if his argument proves anything, it proves that the banks in the West are a positive loss, a positive damage. Aside from public considerations national banking is profitable, and the people of one section of the Union have as much right to enjoy its profits as those of another. As the law now stands they cannot, and there would be just as much propriety in prohibiting forever an equal participation in merchandise or manufactures.

Mr. President, the Senator says that the question of area has nothing to do with the amount of currency a people need; the question of territory has nothing to do with it. I say it has largely to do with it, and every man who has studied the subject ought to know it. Why? Where people live together in a town they can do their business in a bank; but where they are scattered over four or five hundred miles square they carry their money home with them; and their business is conducted not by checks, not by bank-credits, but by actual currency; and where a population is scattered over a large territory it takes more money to do the business than where the people live close together. Does not every man of common sense understand that?

The Senator says population has but little to do with it. Why, says he, if population has to do with it, you might as well consider that the people of the interior of Africa demand as much currency as those in the United States! That shows how clearly the Senator understands the whole thing. He compares the people of Africa to those of the United States! Why, Mr. President, I submit that there is an average among the people of this country. You take forty million people, and all of them require more or less currency; in some places more than others; in some kinds of business more than others. But I say that forty million people do require more currency than ten millions, I do not care what their business may be. But the Senator ignores that. He compares our currency at one time to that of China and our people to those of the interior of Africa, so far as their needs in currency are concerned. I refer to this again to show the confusion of ideas that prevails on the whole question.

When he compares our currency to that of France in the days of the revolution, when the government expected to fall, from hour to hour, and did change from year to year; and when the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] the other day compared our currency to that of the Confederate States, they do not understand the currency of the times or the young and growing country in which they live. We have the best paper currency the world ever saw of its kind, a banking circulation secured by bonds, and less than $400,000,000 of greenbacks secured by the wealth and the honor of the country; and yet it is talked about as a worthless, irredeemable, dishonest, swindling currency.

Mr. President, what are the questions before the United States Senate? Let us strip off all this verbiage? Let us strip off all this obsolete learning that is dragged in here, that fills up and makes a show, but amounts to nothing. What are the questions before the Senate? There are three.

In the first place, there are some Senators who want us to return to specie payments. They want it done immediately. The Senator from Missouri is one of them. Let me consider that for a moment. Are we in a condition to do it?

England has a large debt. She owes it all in her own borders, every dollar of it; she has a large railroad debt; it is all held by her people; none of it held outside. The people of England own a large part of our bonds. They own a large part of the bonds of Russia, of Austria, of Italy, of all the South American republics; and every country in the world, nearly, is sending gold to England every year for the purpose of paying interest upon bonds held by her people. Germany is in the same situation. Germany owns all her own debt and her railroad debt; and she owns bonds of the United States, and of Austria, and of Italy, and of the South American republics; and millions and millions of dollars go to Germany every year to pay the interest upon bonds that her people own of other governments. So it is with France, though in a smaller degree. France holds the bonds of other countries and the railroad securities of other countries; many million dollars in gold go to France every year for the purpose of paying interest on those debts. Consequently those governments are able to have a specie basis; they are able to have a paper redeemable in gold. And now how is it with our country? We owe $1,300,000,000 in Europe. That is the estimate; I have it here from the Bureau of Statistics—about $800,000,000 in Government bonds and about $500,000,000 in railroad and other securities. The interest is to be paid in gold. It takes from $60,000,000 to $70,000,000 in gold every year to pay the interest on our bonds held in Europe. That is equal to the products of our mines and a little over. We are drained every year of not less than $60,000,000 to pay interest abroad.

Mr. LOGAN. The annual products of the mines of the world are only $100,000,000, and twenty-five millions of that are estimated to be used for artificial purposes—jewelry, and things of that kind.

Mr. MORTON. Now, to carry the thought a little further: the bonds of Russia are held in England, Germany, and France. Russia is annually drained of her gold to pay the interest on her bonds abroad. It is the same with Austria. Her bonds are held in North Germany and in England, and she is drained of her gold every year to pay the interest abroad. So with Italy; her bonds are held in England, in North Germany, and some of them in France. What is the result? Russia has suspended specie payments for years; so has Austria; so has Italy; and all the countries in Europe whose bonds are held abroad, and that are annually drained of their gold to pay the interest upon those bonds, are now under a state of suspension; they must continue so as long as that condition continues. We are in the same situation. Europe holds $1,300,000,000 of our bonds, and the interest upon that amount exceeds the annual product of our mines; and while that state of things continues it will be difficult for us to maintain specie payments.

I had occasion to say the other day that specie payment was the result of a condition, not of artificial process, and I repeat that. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] said the other day that while the balance of trade is against us we cannot maintain specie payments; but I will say to my friend from Massachusetts that not only is the balance of trade against us, but we are drained of sixty or seventy millions of gold annually to pay interest. We have that additional obstacle; and yet we are urged to force specie payments by an artificial process.

That is the first proposition before the Senate, that we shall return to specie payments at once. I say to my friend that while this condition of things continues we cannot maintain specie payments without great cost and trouble. The condition must change. When we have brought our bonds home, or a large part of them, when the balance of trade is in our favor, then we can do it. Our Government had no debt abroad before the war. Europe did not hold to exceed one hundred and fifty millions of American railroad bonds in 1861, but yet we are told it is just as easy now to maintain specie payments as it was before the war.

That is the proposition on the other side. What is it on our side? I have said from the first, and I repeat now, that the normal condition of the currency is specie payment when the country itself is in a normal condition. I have said that I did not think this was the time to inaugurate specie payment; that while it must come, and I hoped it would come, and that we would soon be in a condition to do it, I thought this was not the time to inaugurate specie payment; that if we attempted it we must put off the period so long that it would not disturb and embarrass our present business. That is our first proposition on the other side. What is the next?

The next is that the national-bank facilities are not equally divided; we want more in the West; more are wanted in the South. We want the people to have them. How shall they get them? Under the law now they cannot get them. There are many towns in my State that want them, but cannot get them. I want something done that will give the people of Indiana and the Northwest an opportunity to have as many national banks as their local necessities require. That is our proposition.

Again, we think that as the business of the country has increased, population has increased, settlements have extended, we need more currency than we did four, six, or eight years ago; and now we are asking to have some increase; not inflation, but we are asking to have just such an increase as will meet the demands of the country. What is the currency for? It is a medium of exchange, an instrument of convenience. Therefore as business increases we want more conveniences. The medium should be enlarged. We know business has increased; therefore we think there ought to be some increase—not very much—of the medium of exchange. We are met on the other side by the cry of "irredeemable currency," by the rabid cry of "inflation." "O, you are in favor of inflation." We are told that specie payment is the great end, that it is not the means. I say the whole currency is a means; and I will say that that currency is the best for a country under which it has most flourished; I do not care what you call it, that currency is the best under which the country has most prospered, and that volume of currency is the best which most stimulates industry and enterprise. You may call it paper money, irredeemable, gold or silver, it matters not; I say that is the best for the country under which we do best. And I say that in this period of irredeemable currency we have grown and flourished as we never did before. I do not say it was because the currency was irredeemable, but I say that has not prevented us; it has not been the curse that was described by the Senator from Missouri. If an irredeemable currency is the wicked and bad thing he describes, we ought now to be a poor, declining people like that of Spain or some of the other countries in Europe. But the fact is that under that currency we have grown and prospered as we never did before. I would not say that an irredeemable currency made Austria, Russia, and Italy flourish; but I have said that the great fact was, and it cannot be denied, that while those three countries for the last ten years have had an irredeemable currency they have flourished as they had not done in fifty years before.

Why, Mr. President, suppose we do have more currency; suppose we have more speculation. I want to see speculation. I am not afraid to say so. It is very popular to cry out against speculation. Sir, what is it makes a country grow and develop? Speculation. The man who builds a railroad does it as a speculation, but he is a public benefactor. The man who lays out and builds up a town is a speculator, but he is a public benefactor. How does the country stand now? All enterprise is stopped; there is scarcely a railroad building in the United States. Those that were half finished are now left, the most of them, in that condition; there may be a few being prosecuted to final completion, but that number is very small. Railroad-building is stopped, and iron-making is stopped, and all those things that depend upon railroad-building have stopped; and there are no new factories, no new machine-shops being started; very many have suspended, and there are very few houses being built. I saw an article in the New York Times yesterday saying that the building of houses in the environs of New York had greatly fallen off. How does the matter stand? The ordinary traffic in dry goods, in groceries, in grain, goes on; but everything that we may call growth, that we may call development, has stopped, and that is the trouble. I want them to start again. The Senator from Missouri looks upon these things as a curse. I look upon them as a blessing; and I should like to see that legislation take place, if possible, by which the building of railroads would again go forward; the building of towns, farm-houses, and the building of factories. I want to see this country grow, flourish, and develop.

Alison, in his History of Europe, says that this country owed more to paper money than to any other one cause; and he said the reason why the growth on the north side of the Saint Lawrence and the great lakes had been so much less than on the south side was because on the south side we had had a system of paper money, and on the other side they had had a specie currency. The great fact is, and stands out in all history, that every period of growth in a country, every period of extraordinary development, has been a period of abundance of money; and that abundance has generally, though not always, resulted from paper money. It is liable to great danger, it may lead to excess; but does the excess provide an argument against it? Certainly not. Men may gorge themselves with food and become gluttons, but does that prove that food should not be used? We have a system of paper money, the best guarded, the best protected, the world has ever seen. We need not be afraid of it. All that I ask is that it shall be made adequate to our wants, adequate to our demands; and I am not to be frightened by general declarations, general comparisons, with John Law's paper system, and with those banks that had no foundation, no security. The Senator from Michigan the other day talked to us about the wild-cat banks of Michigan that had no capital, the notes of which were not secured by stock, and their money perished in the hands of the people. That cannot take place under our present system. We have a system that we can expand just as we require it to be expanded.

I am glad, Mr. President, to see some evidence of returning common sense upon this subject. The article from the Chicago Tribune read by the Senator goes right back and makes the argument in the face of all that he has said, and of all that will be said, on the other side. He could not answer it. He tried to do so, but utterly failed. What was it? That we might extend the national banking currency as long as the greenbacks were not increased in their amount, and there would be no inflation and no depreciation.

Mr. President, this attempt to recall specie payments at once would be disastrous to the whole body of the people. There is a vast interest in favor of it. I do not blame men for favoring what is for their interest in a general way. Every man who has money wants the value of that money increased; and if the general volume of it is diminished he is made a richer man in consequence of it. There is a great power in favor of that doctrine. But, on the other hand, when you return to specie payments and increase the purchasing power of money, you increase the volume of the debt and you diminish the ability to pay it. If that must come, as come it will, let it come gradually; let it come out of the growth of the country; let it be the result of a condition, and not of an artificial process.

Whether the currency is increased or not one thing is certain—that there ought to be something done to give every locality in the United States the equal benefit of the national banking system. We are struggling for that. Some of us are struggling for both. The attempt is to deny us both, to tell us that it is just as good for us for the East to have all the banks; that national-bank circulation, after all, is a dead loss.

Mr. President, I have spoken much longer than I intended.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President——

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from North Carolina yields to me in order to make a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 24, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

CALL OF STATES FOR BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] desires to introduce some bills for reference only. Inasmuch as there was no session yesterday, and therefore will be no call of the States for the introduction of bills in regular order this week, he asks that there be to-day, by unanimous consent, a call of States for bills for reference only. Otherwise there will be during the whole week requests for unanimous consent to introduce bills for reference.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that will be done.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The call of States for the introduction of bills will be postponed to a little later period in the day, when the House is fuller than it is at present.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK, OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. FARWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency, which was instructed by resolution of the House to examine into the condition of the First National Bank, of the city of Washington, be further authorized to appoint a sub-committee to make such examination, with power to employ a clerk, and a stenographer, if desired, to take the testimony of experts.

Mr. FARWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL E. RANKIN.

The SPEAKER. The first question in order this morning is the unfinished business which comes over from Saturday.

A bill (H. R. No. 1773) for the relief of Samuel E. Rankin, was passed, when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] entered a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, was it not agreed to by unanimous consent there should be a call of States for the introduction of bills for reference?

The SPEAKER. The call of the States has been postponed to a later period, when the House will be fuller. The House is now proceeding with the unfinished business which comes over from Saturday last.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise for the purpose of withdrawing the motion to reconsider. I am aware it will be asking too much of the House to consider a private bill in detail except on private-bill day. While I am satisfied this bill should not pass, still less on a day devoted to general business should a measure of this kind be passed. I therefore withdraw my motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider being withdrawn the bill is passed.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MATTHIAS WHITEHEAD.

The SPEAKER. The only remaining bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar is a bill (H. R. No. 1774) for the relief of Matthias Whitehead. It was reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALBRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CALL OF STATES FOR BILLS.

The SPEAKER. States will now be called for the introduction of bills for reference only.

He also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2172) for the relief of Margaret Ward, for property stolen by Indians; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2173) for the relief of Hugo Wedles, for property stolen by Indians in New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2174) for the relief of Lucien B. Maxwell, for property stolen by the Apache Indians; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF LAND TO PUEBLO CITY.

Mr. CHAFFEE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2175) to authorize the sale of a part of a school section to the city of Pueblo for the purposes of a public park; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ASSAY OFFICE AT HELENA.

Mr. MAGINNIS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2176) to establish an assay office at Helena, in the Territory of Montana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

YELLOWSTONE PUBLIC PARK.

Mr. MAGINNIS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2177) amendatory of and supplemental to the act entitled "An act to set apart a certain tract of land lying near the head-waters of the Yellowstone River as a public park," approved March 1, 1872; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF MONTANA CITIZENS.

Mr. MAGINNIS also presented a joint memorial of the Territory of Montana in relation to the protection of citizens of Deer Lodge and Missoula Counties; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY BRIDGE ACROSS THE NORTH PLATTE RIVER.

Mr. STEELE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2178) for the location and construction of a Government military bridge across the North Platte River at Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INLAND AND SEA-BOARD COASTING COMPANY.

Mr. CHIPMAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2179) to incorporate the Inland and Sea-board Coasting Company of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL BIRDSALL, JR.

Mr. CHIPMAN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2180) granting a pension to Samuel Birdsall, jr., of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JENNET H. NISBET.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2181) granting a pension to Jennet H. Nisbet,; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON CITY AND POINT LOOKOUT RAILROAD.

Mr. RICE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2182) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend their railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

EXTENSION OF CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. MILLIKEN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2183) to authorize the sale of certain lands in Washington City belonging to the United States, and to apply the proceeds thereof to reimburse the expenses of extending the Capitol grounds; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

W. F. CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. GLOVER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2184) for the relief of W. F. Chamberlain, of Lewis County, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. MACDOUGALL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2185) repealing so much of the act of May 21, 1872, as authorizes the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad to run across the public reservation to their depot on Sixth street; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF TIMBER, SWAMP, AND SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. STRAIT presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, relating to the sale of school, timber, and swamp lands; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

AMERICAN REGISTER TO PERUVIAN STEAMSHIP RAYO.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce, for consideration at the present time, a bill granting an American register to the American-built Peruvian steamship Rayo, rebuilt in the United States and converted into a sailing-vessel.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American certificate of registry to the American-built Peruvian steam-ship Rayo, wrecked in foreign waters, and purchased, rebuilt, and changed into a sailing-vessel by citizens of the United States within the United States, to be registered by the name Star of the West, or other proper name.

Mr. CONGER. The Committee on Commerce have directed me to report this bill to the House, and to ask for its passage. The facts in this case are these: This is an American-built vessel, a steamship, sold to Peruvians, and wrecked in foreign waters. Therefore, under the present law the Secretary of the Treasury could not grant an American registry to it, although rebuilt and repaired in the United States. The vessel, after being wrecked, was bought for $3,000, and the expense of labor and material for repairing it in an American port was some $58,000 more than the amount required by the present law to entitle it to an American register. But as she was wrecked in foreign waters, and was also an American-built ship, the Secretary of the Treasury, as the law now stands, could not issue an American register to her. We have the proper proof here of the amount expended in her repair; also a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that under the present law he had no authority to grant a register, but that Congress might so authorize him to do. It comes within the class of cases which the committee have heretofore recommended to the favorable action of the House.

No objection being made, the bill (H. R. No. 2186) was received, read three times, and passed.

DUTIES ON FRUITS.

Mr. MERRIAM. I ask unanimous consent to offer for consideration at this time a joint resolution to which I think there will be no objection. It is a joint resolution in relation to the customs duties on fruits. The Secretary of the Treasury is now paying from $10,000 to $20,000 a day in refunding the duties on fruits.

The resolution suspends the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to refund any moneys collected as customs duties on fruits.

Mr. WOOD. I think the Committee on Ways and Means should have some knowledge of this.

Mr. MERRIAM. The Secretary of the Treasury is to-day refunding from $10,000 to $20,000 a day of this fund.

Mr. WOOD. Let it go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 62) was received, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

EXPORTATION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. BURCHARD, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits, and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 55 of the act of July 20, 1868, as amended by the act of June 6, 1872, and by the act of March 3, 1873, be further amended, by striking out the words "such bonds," where they first occur in said section, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "a transportation bond;" by inserting in the second proviso of said section, after the word "given" and before the word "for," the words "to the collector of the port," and after the words "bill of lading," and before the word "or," the words "or any other port without the jurisdiction of the United States;" by striking out of said section the word "twenty-five," before the word "cents," and inserting the word "ten" in lieu thereof; by inserting after the word "practicable" the words "on arrival of the spirits at the port of export the exporter or owner at that port shall immediately notify the collector of the port of the fact, setting forth his intention to export the same, and the name of the vessel upon which the same are to be laden, and the port to which they are intended to be exported. He shall, after the quantity of spirits has been determined by the gauger and inspector, file with the collector of the port an export entry and an affidavit. He shall also give bond to the United States, with at least two sureties, satisfactory to the collector of customs, conditioned that the principal named in said bond will export the spirits as specified in said entry to the port designated in said entry, or to any other port without the jurisdiction of the United States;" by inserting, after the words "upon which the tax has been paid," the words "and upon the lading of such spirits, the collector of the port, after proper bonds for the exportation of the same have been completed by the exporter or owner at the port of shipment thereof, shall transmit to the collector of internal revenue of the district from which the said spirits were withdrawn for exportation a clearance certificate and a detailed report of the gauger; which report shall show the capacity of each cask in wine gallons, and the contents thereof in wine gallons, proof gallons, and taxable gallons. Upon receipt of the certificate and report, and upon payment of tax on deficiency, if any, in excess of 2 per cent. of the number of gallons of spirits named in the entry of withdrawal, the collector of internal revenue shall cancel the transportation bond; and, further, that the allowance of 2 per cent. for deficiency shall apply to all transportation bonds now outstanding made previous to the passage of this act, in accordance with the regulations under the act of July 20, 1868, as amended by the act of June 6, 1872."

SEC. 2. That section 1 of the act of May 27, 1872, be amended, by inserting after the words "United States," in the first paragraph of said section, the words "or in transit in bond for export," and after the word "warehouse," the third time it occurs, and before the word "bond," the words "or transportation."

Mr. BURCHARD. This bill makes four changes in the existing law in regard to the exportation of distilled spirits.

The first provision authorizes spirits to be exported without requiring that they shall be landed at the particular port named in the bill of lading. It frequently happens that spirits are shipped to some foreign port upon a vessel which is there to await orders. For instance, they may be shipped for Genoa with orders to stop at Gibraltar, there awaiting orders. The vessel, under the existing law, must land the spirits at the particular port named in the original clearance or bill of lading; the cargo cannot be sold at any other port, even though a better market should be found there. A simple change in the existing law meets this difficulty.

The second provision of the bill permits the exporter to give a bond at the port of shipment. Under the existing law a distiller in the interior, wishing to send spirits to a foreign port, is obliged to give bond, holding him responsible for the entire transportation; so that if he wishes to make large shipments, the giving of these bonds may exhaust his responsibility and disable him from continuing the shipments. This bill authorizes the giving of a transportation bond at the port of shipment, the original bond being released.

Again, it is found that in the shipment of spirits, especially alcohol, there is in the barrels an absorption of a small percentage of the spirits. This shrinkage is a heavy tax upon the export; and it seemed fair that there should be a small allowance made for it. The bill provides for an allowance not exceeding 2 per cent. for actual shrinkage, when ascertained upon regauging the spirits at the port of shipment. The price of the export-stamp is reduced from twenty-five to ten cents, because the latter sum will more than cover the expense of the stamp, and it was never intended to derive revenue from exported spirits, but to permit their exportation with the least possible cost and impediment.

The second section of the bill extends the authority of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to abate taxes on distilled spirits destroyed by casualty while in transitu in bonded cars.

The bill has been examined and passed upon by the committee, with the approval of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Indeed, all the details of this bill have been submitted to that officer and meet his approval. I am unanimously instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report the bill and ask for its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask whether under this bill the first bond of the shipper in the interior is to be canceled upon the giving of a bond at the point where the spirits are shipped to a foreign port?

Mr. BURCHARD. The first bond is released.

Mr. KASSON. This bill provides for a substitution of a bond at the port of exportation for the original bond, in order to facilitate the business of exportation. As the matter now stands, the shipper is loaded down with requirements, which sometimes exhaust his responsibility in giving bond for transportation from the point where it is produced to the final destination.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BURCHARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MINT BUILDING AT SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Appropriations the joint resolution (H. R. No. 58) to render available a certain unexpended balance of appropriation.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the construction of the United States branch-mint building at San Francisco, California, now remaining on the books of the Treasury Department to the credit of the appropriation for that work, and unavailable under the provisions of the fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of the act of July 12, 1870, be reappropriated, and made available from and after the passage of this joint resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I make a point of order on that.

The SPEAKER. The point of order of course would lie; but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is asking for unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it go to the committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. It comes from a committee.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will allow me to make an explanation. The money appropriated for the building of this mint at San Francisco could not be used for some time in consequence of trouble in settling the title to the ground. The building is now in the course of construction, and can be completed for the amount already appropriated; but the appropriation will lapse and become entirely unavailable for the purpose intended unless we continue it in force. No increase of the appropriation is asked, but simply that the amount already appropriated may be used within the limits already fixed by law.

Mr. RANDALL. Not expressing any opinion whatever upon the merits of this proposition, I claim that under the rule it should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I withdraw the joint resolution.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the call of committees for reports will be resumed.

LAND CLAIM, OJO CALIENTE, NEW MEXICO.

Mr. PACKARD, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, submitted a report in writing upon the communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of July 22, 1854, a transcript of private land claim reported as number 77 in the name of town Ojo Caliente, in Rio Arriba County, New Mexico; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

LAND GRANT TO ANTONIO CHAVES.

Mr. PACKARD also, from the same committee, submitted a report in writing upon a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of July 22, 1854, a transcript of the land grant to Antonio Chaves, being private land claim reported as number 79; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS, SCOTT COUNTY, MISSOURI.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2187) authorizing and requiring the issuance of a patent for lands to the county of Scott, in the State of Missouri; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read as follows:

Whereas by the act of the Congress of the United States entitled "An act to quiet the title to certain lands in the State of Missouri," approved December 27, 1872, certain lands therein mentioned were granted to the county of Scott, in the State of Missouri, which were not specifically described; and whereas no provision for the issuance of a patent for said lands was made in said act: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause a patent to be issued to said county of Scott, in the State of Missouri, for all the lands included in the State of Missouri in that portion of township number 27 north, of range 12 east of the fifth principal meridian, lying east of Little River, as the same appears on the plat of survey on file in the General Land Office: Provided, That nothing in this act shall prejudice the rights of any person claiming any of said lands by virtue of any homestead, pre-emption, or other entry made under the laws of the United States.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that that bill must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order; and the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. It will save time if the point of order be made before the reading of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. If there is any report accompanying this bill I hope it will be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The bill and report will both be ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. PRATT. I do not think this bill is liable to the point of order. Two years ago a law was passed by Congress providing for the issuance of this patent, but it does not specifically describe the lands for which the patent was to be granted. The only purpose of this bill is to correct that defect. It grants no land, but merely specifically describes lands heretofore granted by act of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the bill is liable to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Vermont. It divests the Government of title which it still holds.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NORTHWESTERN AND INDIANA TERRITORIES.

Mr. PACKARD, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2188) for the relief of persons to whom the governors of the Northwestern and Indiana Territories confirmed lands; which was read a first and second time.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. As the Chair suggests the point of order should be made early, so as to save the time of the House, I will now make the point of order that this bill must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. This bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as it relates to a whole class of cases. It will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PACKARD. If the bill is read through I think the gentleman will not insist on his point of order. This does not provide for granting any land, but merely for locating on, or relocating, land heretofore confirmed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks probably the point of order will more generally apply to this bill, coming from the Committee on Private Land Claims, than any other, for it divests the Government of certain title, and gives to these private land claimants, which they do not have now.

Mr. RANDALL. The language of the rule reaches just this sort of land grants.

The SPEAKER. Clearly it reaches the grant of any form of property whatever.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. BARRERE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 719) to authorize the issuance of patents to lands in cases of private land claims; which was read a first and second time.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that this bill must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole, and there is therefore no necessity for the Clerk reading further.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and is, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GRANT OF LAND TO SCOTT COUNTY, MISSOURI.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] requests the Chair to revise his ruling on the bill reported by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRATT] from the Committee on Private Land Claims, a bill (H. R. No. 2187) authorizing and requiring the issuance of a patent for lands to the county of Scott, in the State of Missouri.

Mr. BARRERE. What becomes of the bill which I reported?

The SPEAKER. The point of order was made that it makes an appropriation and must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. The Chair sustained the point of order, and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The Clerk will now read the bill reported by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRATT.]

The bill was again read.

The SPEAKER. On the reading of that bill, how is the Chair to know that the lands specifically provided for there, and for which a warrant is directed to issue, are the same as those embraced in the other bill?

Mr. BUCKNER. It is the fact that they are the same.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not doubt the gentleman's word; but how, in a parliamentary way, is he to know that the United States is divested of more or less public property? That raises precisely the class of questions which the Chair thinks it was settled by the rule should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUCKNER. The object of this is to describe more specifically and more definitely what was more vaguely described by the former act of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Evidently to give this title, and to divest the United States of the title that may rest in the United States, some additional legislation is necessary, and this legislation is comprised in that bill. Now, the Chair thinks that the rule was made for precisely that class of cases, along with others.

Mr. BUCKNER. This bill is only for the purpose of getting the description more accurate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that the question here is merely as to the parliamentary process. The Chair is not discussing the merits of the bill at all. It is not the province of the Chair to say a word about the merits of a bill. He has merely to state what are the parliamentary processes through which it must pass. And, under the rules, the Chair thinks that this bill should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. The Chair does not change his ruling.

The bill reported by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BARRERE] had a strong point against it. It directs the surveyor-general to accurately survey the lands referred to in exact accordance with the act of Congress formerly passed, and provides that the expenses of the survey shall be paid out of the ordinary appropriation for public surveys. It makes, therefore, a direct money appropriation; and there can be no possible ground to doubt that it should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Both bills will be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PACKARD. I ask that the accompanying reports also be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair always directs that. Every bill sent to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, or to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, is printed with the accompanying report.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McKEE. I rise to a question of order. It is now half-past one o'clock, and I believe there is a special order that the bill in relation to the franking privilege should come up at that hour. Am I not correct?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. McKEE. I call for the regular order.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been called, the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 825) to provide for the distribution of public documents printed by the authority of Congress and of seeds furnished by the Agricultural Department, for the free exchange of newspapers between publishers, and for the free transmission of weekly newspapers by mail within the county where published.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. STOWELL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. STOWELL.] who is not now in his seat, has agreed to give me a portion of his time at the commencement of his hour. I am ready to proceed now, if there be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes that that was the understanding, and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] will proceed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill in all its parts, and I am also opposed to the modification of it proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] which he stated he should offer if he should have the opportunity. I saw some intimation in the papers this morning that the committee had allowed, or would allow, the gentleman from New York to propose his substitute, reviving the entire franking privilege. I will state as briefly as I may my reasons for opposition to this measure. In order to make clear my position I think the subject should be separated from many things and many aspects and phases of it which have been presented to the House during the debate.

The naked and simple propositions contained in this bill are two. In the first place, the bill provides that members of Congress—and so far as the first section is concerned it reaches no further than that—that members of Congress shall have the franking privilege as far as the public documents are concerned. The second provision of the bill is that the franking privilege shall be revived so far as county newspapers and exchanges of newspapers are concerned. Now, this does not involve, necessarily, many of the arguments that have been presented to the House in support of the measure. It is not the question whether the Postmaster-General, in the attack he made upon the franking privilege prior to its repeal in the last Congress, was in all respects right or wrong; it is not the question whether the abolition of the franking privilege has necessarily largely decreased the expenditures of the Post-Office Department. It is a question, on the face of the bill itself, what does this bill propose to do? If it can be defended on its merits, on what it proposes to do, then it ought to pass. If it cannot be defended on its merits, on what it proposes to do, it ought not to pass, no matter what may have happened hitherto in the history of the discussions on this subject.

Now, what does this bill propose to do? It proposes, Mr. Speaker, in the first instance, to revive the franking privilege. The form of the provisions introduced here is merely to prevent the abuse of the franking privilege as revived by this bill. It provides, I say, for the revival of the franking privilege so far as the public documents are concerned. Well, what does that mean, Mr. Speaker? It means this: that this House is prepared to say, or Congress, if it passes this bill, is prepared to say, that we will publish the public documents which are to be distributed by this bill. And how are these documents to be published? They are to be published by an appropriation of money out of the Treasury of the United States. While I suppose it is not possible to estimate precisely the cost of the public documents that will probably be distributed under this bill, should it become a law, it may be fixed approximately at $700,000 or $800,000 annually. The cost of the public documents that this bill proposes to distribute gratuitously to certain portions of the people of the United States, or to certain individuals among the people of the United States, will amount to $700,000 or $800,000 annually.

We do not propose, of course, to put our hands in the Treasury of the United States and every member of Congress take out of that Treasury $2,000, (for that would be the amount which each member would take out under this bill,) and to distribute it, as a distinguished gentleman said in a speech he made last summer, "alike to the just and the unjust." We do not propose to give to each member of Congress the right to go to the Treasury of the United States and take $2,000 and distribute it at his pleasure. To be sure we do not propose to do that in terms, but that is just what we propose to do in fact. We only go through the process of having this $2,000 paid into the Congressional Printing Office, and then come out in the shape of public documents, which we take and distribute.

Mr. MYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman will excuse me. I would yield to him as soon as to any one, but I have not time to yield to any one.

We propose by this bill to put our hands into the Treasury of the United States and take out from $1,500 to $2,000 each, and distribute it as we see fit to the people of the United States. Now, how long would a proposition standing in that naked shape before this House receive assent or support? Suppose that instead of this proposition we had a proposition that each member of Congress should have given him out of the Treasury of the United States $2,000 in greenbacks—printed by the Government, as I suppose my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] would have them printed, and supposed to cost the Government the expense of printing alone—and each member be allowed to distribute those greenbacks at his pleasure? Is there any warrant in the Constitution for any such use of the money of the United States? Is there any warrant in the Constitution for such use of the public property of the United States?

I had supposed hitherto that if the public property of the United States, or the public money of the United States, were to be taken for the purpose of being given to the people of the United States, it was to be given to the whole people of the United States. But to whom do we give the public property of the United States in this case? If we give it to anybody we give it to the persons to whom we choose to send these documents. I suppose a member of Congress may have an opportunity of sending perhaps fifteen hundred or two thousand, possibly three thousand, volumes of documents to individuals in his district, if the same amount be published under this bill that have been printed hitherto.

Mr. MYERS. And to libraries.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Yes, and libraries. The members of this House have from twenty to thirty thousand voters in each of their districts. To distribute these three thousand volumes, they would select three thousand of the thirty thousand voters in their district, or one-tenth of the whole number; or, if they have a few libraries, they would send to the libraries, and that would leave less for a general distribution among the people. They would give these three thousand volumes, the public property of the United States, to three thousand out of the thirty thousand voters in each of their districts.

Now, I am not discussing the question in respect to the cost of the transmission of these documents through the mails at all. In this light the question is separated entirely from what may be called the franking privilege. It is a distribution—an unequal, unjust, and unjustifiable distribution—of the property of the United States among a small fraction of the people of the United States, of property of the United States that has been gathered from the whole of the people of the United States.

I know the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in the entertaining remarks which he submitted the other day, when this bill was before the House, said that we could not do this equally, because there was inequality in all that we undertook to do. But here we provide on the very face of the measure that it shall be unequal. To be sure we do not build light-houses on every rock along the coast of the United States; we all understand that. But if Congress sets up in the business of building light-houses, it assumes, as the very basis of that right to appropriate the money of the United States for that purpose, that it will build the light-houses for all the people who have any opportunity to use them; that it will not put light-houses on the coast of Maine, and refuse them on the coast of Florida; that it will not put them on the coast of Delaware, and refuse them on the coast of Michigan; but it will give every locality a light-house which has the same need for a light-house. That is equality. But when you say that you will print public documents and distribute them; that you will take the property of the people of the United States and allow gentlemen here to distribute it at their pleasure, you might as well say that each member of this House shall have a light-house as his special perquisite, and locate it where he pleases.

Suppose we put this proposition in another form. I am glad to say we have a great amount of the public lands yet left, notwithstanding that we have given them away by the million of acres. What do we do with them? Most of the gentlemen from the West here ask that those lands shall be kept sacred for homesteads, that even the pre-emption laws shall be abolished, and that every person in the United States shall have an equal and the same right to go there and take that property, to locate on it as his homestead.

We do not say that every member of Congress may designate ten persons, or five persons, in his district, who may go and locate on the public lands of the United States, while nobody else shall do so. We do not say that each member of Congress shall have the privilege of designating what particular portions of the public lands shall be set apart for his constituents. But we say that if they are used at all, they shall be used for the benefit of the whole people; that every person shall have equal access and equal right to those lands.

Now, sir, how does such a proposition as this before the House antagonize not only that general principle upon which this Government is based, but more especially the general principles on which the republican party started into life, and on which, as one of its promises, it came into power? It declared that it would do away with all favoritism, with all special privileges, with all use of the Government or the property of the Government for the benefit of individuals or of favorites or pets of anybody; that it would hold the Government of the United States and the property of the United States for the benefit of all the people of the country. If there is any principle upon which the republican party in its foundation based itself as upon a rock, it is this; and the ruin of the republican party can be but a little way ahead when we depart from that principle, and hold that the Government and the property and the Treasury of the United States are the perquisites or special property of any man or any set of men whatever.

I have said in general terms that if this bill should pass it would take out of the Treasury of the United States seven or eight hundred thousand dollars annually. It might take more, it might not take quite so much; that would depend upon the liberality with which Congress might order books. Let me refer to the amount we appropriated last year in the mere matter of the folding-room:

For the superintendent of the folding-room of the Senate	$2,484
Folding documents and materials, Senate	8,000
Superintendent of the folding-room, House	2,484
Folding documents for the House	100,000

This is the mere cost of distributing these documents to the members of the House, who propose to take them as their private perquisites, and the books themselves cost nearly $1,000,000 more annually. Although we may try to disguise our personal interest in the matter by saying it is the perquisite of our constituents, and not our own, I am willing even to discuss the matter in that aspect, and consider it as a proposition to take this public property as the private perquisite of a portion of our constituents. Looking simply at the question of economy, that expenditure of over $1,000,000 annually would certainly be saved. I am arguing this question only in part on the score of economy. Hitherto I have been treating the question upon the ground of what we may call absolute right, absolute equality. But, sir, we have been confronted, at this session especially, with this question of public expenditure. We have been told, and told truly, (whatever may be said of the particular figures which have been quoted,) that the public expenses of this country are increasing. We are cutting off private carriages that have been paid for out of contingent funds. We are trying to cut off private servants who are borne on the rolls of some public office. We are trying to bring every department of the Government down to working on an honest and economical basis so far as it can be done consistently with the efficiency of the public service. Yet after only six months' trial of the repeal of the franking privilege, guaranteeing, if faithfully and honestly pursued, an economy of more than $1,000,000 a year in the mere expense of public documents, gentlemen come in here and ask that this franking privilege shall be restored, and with it, of course, this large expenditure of money out of the Treasury of the United States. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask in all candor and sincerity how gentlemen of this House can support this measure and justify themselves on any principle upon which we are proceeding here in our efforts to economize in the public expenditures?

Mr. Speaker, I am admonished that I am trespassing too far upon the time of the gentleman from Virginia, and I will say only a word or two in conclusion.

There are many aspects of this question—such, for instance, as the question whether this expenditure can be defended upon the ground of dissemination of intelligence—which are not, in my judgment, pertinent to this discussion at all. This Government does not exist for the purpose of disseminating intelligence among a portion of the people of the country. If the proposition were that we should print a million dollars' worth of books, which should be put in the public libraries or perhaps in the Congressional Library, so that every person throughout the United States wanting one of these books might have it sent to him through the mails by addressing the Librarian, I agree that everybody in the United States would have an equal right under such a distribution; and then the question of dissemination of intelligence might be in order. Whether such a measure would be wise or unwise as a matter of administration, everybody would then have an equal chance at the information, whatever it was. But, sir, we do not do any such thing. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PARKER,] who made a very eloquent speech here the other day, and some parts of which excited applause on the floor and in the galleries, asked, "Would you have in this country a President's book-seller? Would you introduce into this country the system now existing in England by which they have in different parts of the country a 'Queen's book-seller,' from whom public documents may be obtained for what they are worth?" Why, let me tell the gentleman that is exactly what this bill does. It makes every member of Congress a congressional book-peddler.

Mr. MYERS. When did the gentleman find that out?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I found it out some days ago, at least. I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Missouri, that this bill makes every member of Congress a book-peddler; we set ourselves up in that business; but we do not do like the Queen's book-sellers, to whom he has referred. Every man who goes to the door of the Queen's book-seller gets the book for which he inquires at the same price for which every other subject of the kingdom can get it. We, however, do not put ourselves in that attitude. We hold these books in our hands and distribute them to whomsoever we please. If a library asks for them, we send them to that library; but outside of a library, to whom do we send them? Do we send these books to everybody? We could not send them to everybody if we tried, because we have not enough of them. It is notorious, Mr. Speaker—and I do not claim to be any better in that respect than my neighbors—it is notorious that we use these books, in part, as a private perquisite. Members do not send them to their enemies. They do not send them to persons who fought them in caucus, who opposed them in convention, who voted against them at the polls. They never send them to such persons; and yet that class of persons are taxed to pay for them as well as those who get them. Members of Congress send them to their personal friends. It is really a private perquisite of members, and unless it is that, members of Congress ought not to have anything to do or say about their distribution.

That is just the attitude in which we put ourselves. We ask that we may have $1,000,000 annually appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States—$2,000 to each member of the House—for books to be distributed, at the pleasure of each member, among a few of the people of his district.

This is not justice. It is not equity. It is not republicanism in any sense whatever. And not only that, sir, it is hostile to the platform upon which every republican member of this House holds his seat to-day.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. If one of the gentleman's constituents writes to him for a book, does he not to-day send it through the mails and pay the postage himself? And, that being the case, how does he justify that misappropriation, as he calls it, of the public funds?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have not justified it at all. I have been opposed to the franking privilege being given to members of Congress from the beginning. I have said from the first it ought not to be restored. When I have put at my disposal a certain number of books, if I do not distribute them they will go to the paper-mills, and of course if my constituents ask for them I shall send them to them. I have sent them to libraries, and to everybody who has asked for them, so long as I had any to send, yet I have numbers of letters asking for documents which I could not send because I did not have them to send. All cannot get them, yet those who want documents and do not get them pay just as much in taxes for them as those who do get them.

Mr. MYERS. The gentleman appoints a cadet to West Point, and those who do not get the appointment pay just as much as those who do.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Whenever it is necessary to discuss that question I will do so, but I will not occupy the floor any longer for such a purpose.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, as early as the 4th of December of this session I introduced a bill, No. 42, providing for the free transmission through the mails of newspapers in the counties where the same are published, and also for the free exchange of papers and periodicals between publishers. It is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the publishers of newspapers and periodicals may send to each other from their respective offices of publication, free of postage, one copy of each publication; and may also send to each actual subscriber, inclosed in their publications, bills and receipts for the same, free of postage. The publishers of weekly newspapers may send to each actual subscriber within the county where their papers are printed and published one copy thereof free of postage.

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of the foregoing section be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

I did this in deference to a general public sentiment in its behalf, and because the people never favored the legislation which compelled them to pay postage on their home papers. The people are the losers by the present law much more than the publishers of newspapers. Since the introduction of bill No. 42, I have received numerous letters from different parts of the country urging the speedy passage of the same. It was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and that committee, before the holiday recess, reported the bill now under consideration, and which in its third section embodies the principles of the bill which I had the honor to introduce.

I propose at this point briefly to refer to the history of legislation upon this subject, to show that the newspaper was always under the friendly tutelage of Congress.

The twenty-first section of the act of February 20, 1792, provides—

That every printer of newspapers may send one paper to each and every other printer of newspapers within the United States free of postage, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe.

Section 21 of the act of May 8, 1794, re-enacted the same.

Section 3 of the act of March 3, 1845, is as follows:

That all newspapers of no greater size or superficies than nineteen hundred square inches may be transmitted through the mail by the editors or publishers thereof to all subscribers or other persons within thirty miles of the city or town or other place in which the paper is or may be printed, free of any charge for postage whatever.

This is the first law that allowed subscribers (within thirty miles of the place where the paper was published) to receive it postage free. It embraced daily papers, and was not confined to county lines. This law continued in force six years—as to daily papers, to March 3, 1851.

Section 35 of the act of March 3, 1863, after regulating the postage on newspapers, periodicals, &c., provides as follows:

But the publishers of weekly newspapers may send to each actual subscriber within the county where their papers are printed and published one copy thereof free of postage.

This law confines its privileges to weekly papers, and makes the county line, instead of thirty miles, the limit.

Section 3 of the act to July 27, 1868, modifies section 35 of the act of March 3, 1863, as follows:

But nothing in this act shall be so construed as to require carriers to distribute said papers unless postage is paid upon them at a rate of five cents per quarter, &c.

The act of January 31, 1873, swept out of existence all franking laws and privileges, and went further than many of the enemies of the franking privilege desired. The people now demand a restoration of this privilege, and I am gratified to know that in all the speeches which have been made upon the bill under consideration no voice has been raised against this provision. The Postmaster-General concedes the fact that he never desired the adverse legislation on newspapers, and does not now object to its restoration. The honorable Speaker of the House, [Mr. BLAINE,] in a letter dated December 17, 1873, says:

If I would vote for any possible exception to the rule of uniform and universal payment [of postage] it would be in favor of newspaper exchanges and the free circulation of county papers within their own bailiwicks.

It is not necessary here to speak of the power of the press and the influence it exerts in the education of the masses either for the right or wrong. If it is true that the press is corrupt and unreliable, public men have had much to do in giving it its present status; but certain it is that you will not elevate and improve it by hostile and unfriendly legislation.

I take it for granted, then, that so much of this bill as relates to newspapers will become a law. We see that these concessions to the cause of popular education have existed for many years and have met the prompt approval of some of the wisest statesmen with which our country has been blessed. In view of this fact, Mr. Speaker, I am led to the conclusion that these excellent provisions must have been inadvertently swept away by the besom of economy that was set in operation by the popular call for reformation in the extravagant practices which had of late years grown out of the injudicious use of the franking privilege. They met this fate from the fact that newspapers were transmitted in company with matter which had fallen into disgrace by obtruding itself into the mail-bags and showing a pass instead of paying fare. Like the tame goose in the fable, they had their necks wrung for having been found in bad company.

Mr. Speaker, the other question is, whether the things named in the first section of the bill under discussion shall be allowed to pass through the mail without charge, or whether the people shall have them at all; because it seems to me that unless provision is made to send them out they had better not be procured. If the only idea upon this subject is saving money, then the best road to travel in is to take a cross and near cut and dispense altogether with the printing and publishing of the things named in the section to which I have referred. If we print and procure them, then the means ought to be provided for their distribution; otherwise they become waste material. The repeal of the franking privilege puts this whole matter in an anomalous position, as I shall endeavor to show in the course of my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, if I understand the policy of the Government with regard to the management of the Post-Office Department, it has been more with the object of accommodating the people in the speedy, safe, and certain transmission of mail matter than with a view of raising revenue, and hence efforts have never been specially made for having the Post-Office Department make money, because it has at all times been in the power of the Government to make large revenues out of the Post-Office. Indeed the machinery of this Department is peculiarly fitted and adapted to this purpose, but the history of the Post-Office Department shows that a constant and steady reduction and equalization of the rates of postage has been going on. Within my recollection letter postage has been reduced from twenty-five cents to three cents. This has been done because the Post-Office Department stands before the world as a benefactor and educator, by bringing intelligence to almost every door at a rate much cheaper than individual or corporate influence could accomplish it, while the benefits it dispenses inure alike to the rich and poor, yet particularly is it the friend of the poor, because the concessions in the way of cheap postage and of affording mail facilities in remote and sparsely settled portions of the country are directly in the interest of the hardy and enterprising pioneer. And the same may be said with regard to the free-delivery system in the large cities. The free-delivery system brings the post-office to every fireside in the cities at an extra cost now of about $2,000,000 per annum.

It is not a question of so much importance, then, whether the revenues of the Post-Office Department pay the expenses of the Post-Office Department, as it is whether the revenues of the Government generally pay the expenses of the Government. How any money is made for the Government by the Executive Departments thereof using postal stamps in their official correspondence instead of an autograph frank is not readily comprehended, or how the use of stamps checks abuse. When the franking privilege existed all matter sent through the mail by the Departments of the Government went free. The use of stamps makes the cost to the Government no less. In all the discussion upon this subject I have failed to discover where the saving of money comes in; nor have I been able to find where the Postmaster-General has elucidated the matter, except upon the principle that it pays to rob Peter to pay Paul. The Executive Departments of the Government still frank, but under another name—a stamp instead of an autograph. The stamping business costs thousands of dollars more annually than the autographing did, but Uncle Sam foots the bill as before for carrying the mail. There may be great wisdom in all this, but the progress of the masses has been too slow to comprehend it, and hence they can but look on the car as it passes by, and wonder.

In this light, then, can it be fairly and truly said that anything has been gained by the abolition of the franking privilege? I hear gentlemen say that the franking privilege was a good thing, but that its abuses broke it down. I admit this; but tell me what good thing you could have if the abuse of it was a conclusive argument for its abolition and removal? This bill is an attempt at a partial restoration of the franking privilege, with the abuses cut off. Franking, as exercised by Congress, was instrumental in the dissemination of intelligence among the people. It is suggested by some that everybody was not supplied with the same document, and that therefore the system worked unequally and unjustly, and should not be even partially restored. Well, sir, if there is any force in this argument, it might apply to the abolition of Congress itself. Because everybody cannot be elected to Congress at the same time, nobody ought to be, and therefore there should be no Congress.

I think every member on this floor experiences this truth, that it is a little easier to supply a constituent with a public document than to procure a seat in this House. You provide for the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; you donate to each member twenty-five copies or more; you do it out of the people's money. Now, it is understood that each member will distribute these among such persons as he sees fit, and where he thinks they will do the most good. If the argument of the gentlemen on the other side of this question is worth anything, there ought to be enough RECORDS provided to furnish one to each constituent, or none. This statement shows the absurdity of the argument. It is to be presumed that a member of Congress ought to have some little sense and discretion in the distribution of such documents as he may be intrusted with.

The truth is, that all persons connected with the Government are endowed with the privilege of franking except Senators and Members of the House of Representatives in Congress, and their Secretary and Clerk; that is, they are supplied with frank-stamps at the expense of the Government. The stamping army now consists of forty thousand men and women, to say nothing of boys and girls, and I suppose it is growing daily. All, or nearly all, Government officials are mustered on the stamp-rolls except Congressmen. Official stamps are authorized, because public servants ought not to be called upon or expected to pay postage upon correspondence relating to public business, and because it is safe to trust everybody in the public service except Senators and Members of the House of Representatives. The Petroleum V. Nasbys, postmasters at Confederate Cross-Roads, can safely be intrusted with the necessary stamps for their official correspondence, even if they should perchance occasionally write letters to their friends, the Deacon Pograms.

If Congressmen have constituents—and it is to be presumed that most of us have—a few to whom we must write and send public documents occasionally, we may safely be intrusted with the privilege, if we buy the necessary stamps for sending them through the mail. If the American Congress cannot respect itself, the people will not, much.

Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to say it, I think there is very little strength in the statement that public documents ought not to be distributed gratuitously unless enough are provided to send one to each tax-payer or voter, but that they ought only to be sold. It was well said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that there can be no law, however just, that will work perfect equity in all respects.

I will illustrate what I mean. Take the Agricultural Report. Several of these sent to a few practical and intelligent men in a township, who generally make such use of them as will bless and benefit their entire community, will do fully as much good as if every man in the township had one, and in that way useful knowledge is disseminated, the nation profited, and the material interests of the country advanced. The same is true with many other documents, and particularly with packages of seeds, cuttings, roots, and scions. To supply every voter with each article would bankrupt the nation worse than the war.

If this whole business is to be regulated upon the principle of money-saving only, stop the printing of documents. Stop sending out packages of seeds, &c. You cannot send a quart of wheat to every farmer; and if you cannot, then, according to the argument of the apostle of the grangers, you ought to send to nobody. This point can never be reached unless you can turn back the finger of progress on the dial-plate of time. The argument closes in upon you. You must follow it up by doing away with the Department of Agriculture, of the Signal Service, and other departments of useful and scientific information. Thereby you can make the greatest saving, and blind but stupid equity can be measured out to everybody, and nobody will be benefited, but everybody injured.

Some statements have been made, with regard to the expense of printing and binding congressional documents, during this debate, which are wide of the mark. To correct these, I propose to read the following extract from a letter from Hon. A. M. Clapp, Congressional Printer, under date of December 27, 1873:

> The appropriation for the printing and binding for the Government for several years has been about $2,000,000 per annum. During the last year, ending September 30, the amount expended for printing and binding for Congress was $874,998.27; for all the Executive Departments, including the judiciary and the Government Printing Office, was $1,210,239.77.
> It is but truth to state that the printing and binding for the executive and judicial departments include all the blanks, blank-books, &c., required for the business of the Government here and elsewhere throughout the country.
> The Department of Agriculture also is supplied with all its printing and binding from this office.
> It is apparent from the records of this office that the greater part of the $2,000,000 appropriated for the public printing and binding is absorbed by the Executive Departments of the Government, instead of being, as is stated in the paragraph quoted above, "expended for public documents which have gone through the mails free."
> From a careful examination and analysis of the books of this office, it appears that of the $874,998.27 expended in 1873 for all the printing and binding for Congress, the amount absolutely used for the printing and binding of extra numbers of documents "which have gone through the mails free" is $518,394.12, which, instead of being the greater part of the $2,000,000 appropriated and expended for the public printing and binding, is really only about one-fourth of the entire amount. Of the above amount, $153,751.84 have been expended for the census of 1870.

Now, sir, while I have no anxiety or desire for a restoration of the franking privilege for myself, so far as it relates to my little correspondence, I do think that if we authorize the printing of public documents and the maintaining of the Department of Agriculture and other valuable and important Bureaus of the Government to furnish information for the people at great expense, we ought to provide some means whereby we can send out the documents and the seeds, information, &c., from the Departments, so that they may do the good we expect from them. Believing that this will be right and that the people will justify it, I shall vote for the pending bill. If it is considered unwise to provide the money to send out these documents, then we had better retrace our steps.

The appropriations for the Department of Agriculture last year were $127,550, and I believe the people have more than realized this amount out of the knowledge they acquired from this source. I believe in wise, liberal, and judicious legislation; and I believe that this bill points in that direction, and I shall vote for it. I have no objection to putting the daily papers on the free list.

Mr. STOWELL. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is of so much importance, and its passage so universally demanded, that it will receive as strong an indorsement, both here and from the people of the country, as any measure which is likely to be proposed for the action of Congress, and will, I believe, be adopted by this House by an overwhelming vote.

Occupying as I do, as a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, a relation to the bill itself as one of its advocates and defenders, as well as to the Department to be affected by it, to the members of this House who are to act upon it, and to the people of the country who are to judge of its wisdom and decide upon its necessity and usefulness, I deem it my duty to make a clear and concise statement of the history of the franking privilege, of the principles which underlie it, and the reasons which have governed me in advocating this question before the House so soon after its repeal by the Forty-second Congress—reasons sufficient to satisfy the judgment of any member that he as well as the committee will be justified in voting for this bill, not as granting a privilege, not as renewing the franking privilege, but as securing a right which the member and his constituents are clearly entitled to, and as restoring a policy which is clearly beneficial to all the people.

On the 31st of January, 1873, in obedience to the insinuating demands of the city newspapers, and in compliance with the resolutions incorporated in the platform of the successful party in the presidential campaign ending November, 1872, a law was passed totally abolishing the franking privilege after the 1st day of July, 1873.

The reasons urged so successfully for abolishing, with only a few minutes' debate and consideration, a policy and principle which had been in existence from before the formation of our present Constitution, and had been interwoven by constant practice with the workings of the post-office system, were, that the people in overwhelming numbers had recently condemned it as unjust, and the Postmaster-General had pronounced it expensive and a burden upon the people.

It is easy to controvert both these assumptions, and I think I can do it completely; and in addition I propose, in the time allotted me, to give a statement of the principle involved which first led to the establishment of a system of free postage for Government matter and business; a history of its inception and progress, especially in the United States, and the controlling policy and expediency which have continued it in uninterrupted existence from colonial days to the stampeding days of the Forty-second Congress, when the Credit-Mobilier scare so frightened it, that it was anxious to recover its courage by obeying the behests of any party making any dictatorial suggestions.

I am sure the republican party won its laurels in the campaign of 1872 upon far different issues, and its success was due to far higher questions of principle and policy than the abolition of the franking privilege; and that, while it appeared as one of the planks in their platform, it was incorporated there in the first place by an individual request, and was in no general sense the action of the committee on resolutions or of the convention itself; but was adopted because it was wholly overlooked, as unimportant in comparison with others which were essential, and thus was indorsed by the convention and entered into the campaign. Not one man in ten thousand in the republican party desired to have it in the republican platform; and not one in ten thousand in the democratic party objected to their platform because of its absence therefrom. In other words, it was entirely ignored by the people of both parties. So much for the first reason assigned for its repeal.

I shall attempt to show that, with the exception of a few interested newspapers which desire no information conveyed to the people unless through their columns, and the interference of a few postmasters who, thinking they would thereby curry favor with the Post-Office Department, made themselves active in circulating petitions for signatures to indorse the suggestions of the Postmaster-General, the people did not condemn the franking privilege, and it was not an expensive burden upon them; but that the reasons which called it into existence a hundred years ago still exist, and the practical benefits which commended it so strongly as to continue it in existence for so many years would again result from its re-establishment.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] complains of the abuse of the franking privilege. I know of no better commentary upon or greater abuse of it than that exhibited by the gentleman himself, when he produces bushels of franked petitions, sent by thirty-five thousand postmasters, manufactured for the purpose of abolishing the frank.

While the consideration of this subject deals so much in facts and details, and is so eminently practical that it would be impossible to infuse any enthusiasm or awaken any interest in it beyond the consideration due it as a matter of business, yet underlying all this policy, sanctioned by hundreds of years of custom, is a principle which has in reality given it vitality and coherence of life. While, therefore, I shall confine myself mostly to a rehearsal of facts and figures—which, though somewhat tedious, cannot fail to convince the House—I shall at the same time strengthen my position by the precedent of years of practice, founded originally upon this principle.

A graver question is seldom submitted to Congress, for it affects the means of supplying intelligence to the people; and its importance should be duly impressed upon members. Gentlemen seem to forget that the free interchange of Government communications and public documents is the basis of the post-office system, and the primary cause of its establishment. The carrying of private letters is secondary and subservient to its real business. The magnitude of the private correspondence, in comparison with the governmental, causes many of us to consider that only, and to look upon the free transmission of the Government matter as an offshoot of it, and to lose sight of the fact that the Post-Office Department is strictly a department of the Government to be used for public purposes, just as much as the War, Navy, Interior, or Treasury Departments are; and when it ceases to be used by the Government, and is used only for the benefit of individuals, so that the Government uses it only on the same conditions, in the same way, and at the same rate as individuals, then the Government had better resign control of it at once, and turn its management over to private individuals; for the Government can find better employment than engaging in the private express business to such an extent; and this is nothing but an express business in fact.

A republican government like ours depends for its success, prosperity, and permanence upon the general intelligence of all its citizens, who must understand that it is based upon the principle of equal justice to all; that extending, as it does, over a vast area, its perpetuity is dependent upon the support of an intelligent public sentiment, to secure which all the people should have a full knowledge of the relative duties of each man as a part of society, and as a citizen of a republic dependent upon him for its advancement; that the more generally knowledge is diffused, and the more thoroughly the same kind of knowledge is diffused, so as to produce homogeneity of thought and purpose, the better for the republic, and nothing can procure the speedy interchange of analogous ideas like a perfect mail system. Whoever favors the principle of self-government and desires success to our Republic must protect the Post-Office Department, for it is more necessary to our prosperity and existence than to those of any other government. It is the means whereby the circulation is maintained with regularity, which diffuses in every place and direction that information which is the life of our republican Government, and the never-failing source whence it draws its nourishment.

While the primary object of the Post-Office Department is to carry and deliver, free of postage, Government letters, yet it accommodates the individual also, by carrying his communication at the same time, and thus accomplishes a double purpose; for the post-office system is admitted to be one of the best instruments within the range of human invention for the diffusion of knowledge among the people. Its advantages in this respect are manifest, its worth self-evident, and its utility apparent in strengthening the ties of affection between those who are scattered over a wide range of territory; its value is self-evident in facilitating business, in preserving friendship, in transmitting sympathy, in relieving want, and in interchanging the pleasantries and amenities of life between those living in distant parts of our country. Nothing reaches nearer the daily life of the people than the post-office system, which extends until it finds every family in the nation, bearing to it some knowledge which promotes science, morality, or religion, diffusing the information through innumerable channels to those persons to whom directed, for whom it was intended, or for whose improvement it was aimed.

It is important to inform the people of the doings of the national Government, or they will lose all interest in it and look only to the State government. You can retain their interest in it by keeping them thoroughly informed of your doings. No man can take much interest in a subject about which he is ignorant; while an intimate knowledge creates an affection which increases with the intimacy.

The extent of our country and the remote situation of many of our people have been of great danger to the integrity of our existence. Mountains and rivers, climates and products, divide us into sections with many diversified interests. These segregating influences require strong counteracting ones to preserve us as a nation. Such influences can only be generated and made available by the free intercourse of the people, not only in personal acts but in epistolary correspondence, and by the education of the people in the same general subjects and in the same line of thought, by furnishing them with the same kind of reading. This can only be done at public expense, and through Government channels. The intricate ramifications of the Post-Office Department extend over the whole country like the arteries in the human body, carrying information to the extremities of the Republic. Utilize these advantages and the work is accomplished, and he who is pioneering on the frontier or sojourning in a foreign land may not only communicate with his family and transact his business, but may be brought to as intimate a knowledge and sympathy with the Government itself and its prosperity as the more favored citizen nearer its capital.

It was the thorough distribution of public documents and public information that so fully awakened the sympathies of the people and so completely bound them to the Government in the late rebellion, But for the franking privilege the rebellion would not have been suppressed so speedily; and the agitation of the slavery question, which finally led to its abolition, would never have been commenced. So much at least is due to the frank. Where did the opposition to it come from? Where did all the complaints come from? They did not come from the people. Neither the farmer, the mechanic, the laborer, nor the professional man made complaint against the frank. The cry came from the editors of the daily papers in the large cities, not from the readers; from the disbursers, not from the seekers after information. I know of no such demand from the vast aggregate of the people of the country; none was made. The compliance was in obedience to the demands of the few; and yielding to that demand you shut out the vast majority of the people of the country, who are without the advantages of a daily paper, from the little boon they now possess in the opportunity of becoming officially acquainted with the doings of the Government.

The newspapers of this country have done a grand and noble work in educating the people; but they make a mistake when they try to extinguish every other channel of communicating intelligence to the people.

Let us see how these complainants stand. Do they not live in a very large-sized "glass house"—so very large as to admonish them to be careful not to throw stones?

The postmaster of New York City, who appeared before our committee a few days ago, says that of the sixty tons of mail matter passing through that office every day, one-half of 1 per cent. belongs to the third class; 9 per cent. to the first class; and over 90 per cent. to the second class, the second class being composed of printed matter, issued regularly from the office of publication. This would give about fifty-four tons of such matter in each day, and in twenty-five days it would equal in weight the total quantity of documents sent out during the two years of the Forty-second Congress by the House of Representatives. As the bulk of this consists of daily papers, it follows that the daily papers of New York alone each twenty-five days send out, almost entirely free from postage, as much printed matter in weight as the House of Representatives sent out during the two years of the Forty-second Congress, or as much each twelve days as the House did in one year. And these are the men who cry out against the abuses of the franking privilege!

In further elucidation of the absurd action of the daily papers let us look at some of the figures of the Postmaster-General, which he uses in advocating prepayment of postage on newspapers and other matter of the second class.

The total revenues of the Post-Office Department for 1873 were, $22,996,741.57; the total revenues of the Post-Office Department for 1873, upon matter of the second class, were $1,072.998.19. That is, one dollar out of every twenty-three collected comes from postage on the papers who object to the renewal of the franking privilege.

The total expenditures of the Post-Office Department for 1873 were $29,084,945.67. Fully five-sixths in weight of all the mail matter transported are of the second class. Five-sixths of $29,084,945.67 are $24,237,454.72. That is, the amount spent in carrying newspapers is greater than the total amount collected by the Post-Office Department, and twenty-five times greater than the amount collected from newspapers.

To further show the unreasonableness of the complaints of the metropolitan press I will present the following table, taken from Hudson's Journalism of the United States, showing the newspaper and periodical circulation in the United States:

Years.	Number.	Annual copies.	Population.
1704	1	16,000	600,000
1725	4	170,000	1,000,000
1775	37	1,200,000	2,800,000
1810	359	22,321,700	7,239,814
1828	852	68,117,796	12,000,000
1835	1,258	90,361,000	14,000,000
1840	1,631	195,838,673	17,069,453
1850	2,526	426,409,978	23,191,876
1860	4,051	927,951,548	31,445,080
1870	5,851	1,508,548,250	38,555,753

In 1870 there were published in the United States 542 daily papers, 4,425 weekly papers, and 904 magazines. Number of daily papers printed, 1870, 800,000,000; number of weekly, 1870, 600,000,000; number of all other publications, 1870, 100,000,000.

When you take into consideration that there are over fifteen million copies of papers and magazines published annually in the United States, and that the vast majority of these pass through the mails, while the amount collected is only $1,000,000, or one cent postage for every fifteen papers, it looks as if the right place in which to commence reform and save money to the Treasury is in these very newspaper offices.

Daily, @ 30 cents per quarter, $1.20 per annum:

In the above estimates the lowest rate for each class is used.

Newspapers should pay $2,300,000 revenue to the Government instead of $1,000,000, as at present. The number of papers circulating free for two years is 2,262,000,000, on which the postage would be $6,000,000. The postage on documents sent out free by Congress, in two years, is about $600,000; and during the same time the newspapers send out publications on which postage is not paid amounting to $6,000,000.

In considering this question we should not forget its importance to the country, and the necessity for caution in recommending any variance from the custom established by years of practice; and the wisdom of examining closely the objects to be attained, and the means to be employed, before departing from the usages of the past. The Forty-second Congress failed in this respect, and in one act of a few lines, full of haste and uncertainty, reversed and annihilated the policy of the Government from its very beginning. It remains with us, as representing the latest wish of the people, to restore the time-honored privilege which, without interruption, has existed even beyond the existence of our Government—that portion relating to the free exchange of newspapers dating back to 1753.

Just before the war a full examination of this question was had by a committee of some of the leading men of that day, in Congress, who were especially appointed for that purpose. I take the liberty of making the following extracts from their report, which report is the most concise statement of reasons for the continuance of the franking privilege I have ever seen, and was most convincing to the Congress of that day:

Though the post-office system, as it exists at this day, is essentially a modern institution, yet posts are of very ancient date, and in every instance have been either established or regulated by the state. In Arabia and Persia they existed long before the Christian era, and their speed in oriental figure of speech was outstripped only by the flight of time.

Under the Roman Emperors, the postal system was, as to expedition at least, brought to great perfection; and Tiberius was accustomed to indignantly reject all dispatches which had been longer on the way than twenty days from the extremest provinces of Asia. In the Middle Ages, also, posts were established in various countries of Europe; and in Peru, at its discovery in 1527, the orders of the Inca were regularly dispatched by couriers posted at convenient distances along the principal highways. In India, also, and earlier still in Tartary, a postal system existed, which in the latter country was very extensive and complete. And at this day the post-office is an established institution of every state in Europe and America; and in all it is under the control of government. More than this, it has in almost every instance been first established by the state for its own exclusive service in the transmission of public dispatches and other official intelligence. The use of it by private persons has, for the most part, been an incident growing up under it first from the necessities or conveniences of trade and commerce, or of social correspondence, and ultimately for the sake of income to the state; and Blackstone treats of it in his Commentaries as a fixed and important part of the King's revenue. In no country is postage paid on public dispatches or communications by government officers out of their own private means. Even in Great Britain, the abolition of franks in 1839 extended only to parliamentary and not to executive franking.

Within a few years after the first British settlements in America, posts were established by the Legislatures of several of the colonies. In 1639, by authority of the General Court of Massachusetts, a postmaster was appointed in Boston, and in 1657 Virginia provided for the transmission by each planter, under the penalty of a hogshead of tobacco, the currency of that day, of government dispatches from one plantation to another, till they should reach the place of their destination. One of the earliest acts of William Penn was the establishment, in 1683, of a post-office in Pennsylvania; and a monthly post was appointed, in obedience to the King's command, between New York and Boston in 1672. As early as 1692 a Postmaster-General for all the colonies was appointed by letters-patent, with power to erect post-offices, but no efficient system was established till 1710, when, by act of Parliament, the Postmaster-General was authorized to set up a general letter office in New York, and other chief offices in each of the colonies.

Dr. Franklin served in the Post-Office Department for nearly forty years, from 1753 to 1774 was Postmaster-General for all British America, during which period he reduced the service to a system, and for the first time made it yield a revenue to the Government.

As early as the 26th day of July, 1775, before the Declaration of Independence, in the very inception of the struggle then concentrating, a general postal system was organized by the Continental Congress, which continued with some minor alterations such as exempting postmasters from military service, until the act of October 13, 1782, and was the basis of the law of that date, and in fact of all subsequent laws; and in that system was recognized the free interchange of communications by all Government officers, as an essential and undisputed part of the law itself. This right was granted by universal consent, because considered necessary and important, before the Articles of Confederation were adopted, and was practiced by the officials of that day without restraint, as an essential to success.

Throughout the war of the Revolution, by order of the Continental Congress, and under the direction of the Postmasters-General appointed by them, postal arrangements, more or less imperfect, were continued; and the Articles of Confederation, ratified finally in 1781, gave to Congress the sole and exclusive right and power of establishing and regulating post-offices from one State to another throughout the United States, and exacting such postage on the papers passing through the same as might be requisite to defray the expenses of the office.

Under the authority granted by the Articles of Confederation, and quoted above, the Continental Congress passed, on the 13th of October, 1782, a general postal law, consolidating the fragmentary laws then existing and reducing it to a system, and among other provisions contained in that act I find the following, conferring the franking privilege:

And be it further ordained by the authority aforesaid, That letters, packets, and dispatches, to and from the members and secretary of Congress, while actually attending Congress; to and from the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of these United States, or commander of a separate army; to and from the heads of the Departments of Finance, of War, of Foreign Affairs of the United States, on public service, shall pass and be carried free of postage.

And be it further ordained, That single letters, directed to any officers of the line in actual service, shall be free of postage.

On the 24th of December, 1782, the same year, the franking privilege was still further extended by the following act:

Be it ordained, &c., That the privilege of franking letters be, and the same is hereby, extended to the Inspector-General, the Adjutant-General, the Director of the Hospitals, the Quartermaster-General, the Commissary of Prisoners, and the Paymaster-General of the Army of the United States, and that the same privilege be, and the same is hereby, extended to the officers at the heads of like departments in any separate army, all letters to and from whom, on public business, shall pass free of postage.

On the 28th February, 1783, the franking privilege was still further fortified by the following act:

That all letters to and from the heads of Departments on public service are free, and ought not to be detained for want of the words "on public service" indorsed.

The convention of 1787 found the post-office and the franking privilege coexisting institutions, established and strengthened by universal use and undisputed precedence, and they continued it by conferring upon Congress in article 1, section 8, of the Constitution the power "to establish post-offices and post-roads."

This grant of power is unlimited; and taken in connection with the section which gives Congress power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying the foregoing into execution, confers the exclusive control of the whole subject upon Congress. The convention saw that exclusive control must be vested in some power having unity, because unity is necessary to efficiency; and Congress is the only authority having unity of purpose which possesses also the powers commensurate with the extent of the service.

The same law continued in force, with slight modifications, which were always in the shape of an extension or enlargement of the right, down to the act of 1845, which is the basis of the present law.

Below will be found a synopsis of every law passed upon this subject.

Act of March 3, 1791:

That all letters to and from the Treasurer, Comptroller, and Auditor of the Treasury, and the assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury, on public service, shall be received and conveyed by the post free of postage.

February 20, 1792, the franking privilege was granted to the Commissioner of the Revenue.

May 8, 1794:

SEC. 19. That the following letters and packets, and no other, shall be received and conveyed by post, free of postage, under such restrictions as are hereinafter provided; that is to say: all letters and packets to and from the President or Vice-President of the United States, and all letters and packets, not exceeding two ounces in weight, to or from any member of the Senate or House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Senate or Clerk of the House of Representatives, during their actual attendance in any session of Congress, and twenty days after each session; all letters to and from the Secretary of the Treasury, Comptroller, Register, and Auditor of the Treasury, the Treasurer, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, Commissioner of the Revenue, the Postmaster-General, his assistants and deputies.

An examination of this shows that the President, the Vice-President, and members of Congress had the right to send "letters and packets," while the executive officers were limited to letters. Members of Congress could frank during the session and for twenty days after it.

February 23, 1795, the franking privilege was granted to the Purveyor of Public Supplies.

May 27, 1796, to the accountant of the War Department.

March 3, 1797, to George Washington, for life.

June 22, 1798, to the Secretary of the Navy.

July 11, 1798, to supervisors and inspectors of internal revenue.

July 16, 1798, to the accountant of the Navy Department.

March 2, 1799:

SEC. 17. That letters and packets to and from the following officers of the United States shall be received and conveyed by post, free of charge:

Each postmaster, provided each of his letters and packets shall not exceed one-half ounce in weight; each member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States; the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, provided each letter or packet shall not exceed two ounces in weight; and during their actual attendance in any session of Congress, and twenty days after such session; the President of the United States, Vice-President, the Secretary of the Treasury, Comptroller, Auditor, Register, Treasurer, Commissioner of the Revenue, supervisors of the revenue, inspectors of the revenue, commissioners for direct taxes, Purveyor, the Secretary of War, accountant of the War Office, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Navy, and accountant of the Navy, the Postmaster-General and Assistant Postmaster-General; and they may all receive their newspapers by post, free of postage: Provided, That the members of the Senate and the House of Representatives, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives shall receive their newspapers free of postage only during any session of Congress and twenty days after the expiration of the same: And provided, That no letter or packet from any public officer shall be conveyed by post, free of postage, unless he shall frank the same by writing his name and office on the outside of such letter or packet, and until he has previously furnished the postmaster of the office where he shall deposit the same with a specimen of his signature.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That every printer of newspapers may send one paper to each and every other printer of newspapers within the United States, free of postage, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General shall provide.

SEC. 20. That all newspapers conveyed in the mail shall be under cover, open at one end, and charged with a postage of one cent each for any distance not more than one hundred miles, and one and one-half cents for any greater distance: Provided, That the postage of a single newspaper from any one place to another in the same State shall not exceed one cent; and that the Postmaster-General may make such regulations as to require those who receive newspapers by post to pay always the amount of one quarter's postage in advance.

No newspapers shall be received by the postmasters to be conveyed by post, unless they are sufficiently dried and inclosed in paper wrappers, on which, besides the direction, shall be noted the number of papers which are inclosed for subscribers and the number for printers.

This act of March 2, 1799, it will be observed, extended the frank so as to include newspapers with other free matter, and provided for the interchange of newspapers between publishers, upon which, besides the directions, the number inclosed was to be noted. It will also be observed the one quarter's postage was to be paid in advance, and that while the postage on a letter was eight cents it was but one cent on a newspaper.

January 2, 1800, the franking privilege was granted to the Delegate of the Northwest Territory, W. H. Harrison.

February 23, 1800, to the Superintendent of Stamps.

April 3, 1800, to Martha Washington.

February 25, 1801, to John Adams, (letters to.)

March 3, 1801, to John Adams, (letters from.)

May 3, 1802, to the Attorney-General.

February 18, 1802, to the Delegate from the Northwest Territory.

March 26, 1804, to the Inspector and Paymaster of the Army.

February 28, 1809, to Thomas Jefferson.

June 28, 1809, on letters from Thomas Jefferson.

April 30, 1810, officers were again designated who were entitled to the franking privilege, and it includes all those designated in the act of March 2, 1799, and each subsequent act, and which I need not here repeat, as they will be found above.

It will be seen that, from 1810 to 1825, the privilege was constantly enlarged.

April 30, 1810, franking privilege was granted to adjutant-general of the State militia.

April 25, 1812, to the Commissioner General Land Office.

March 28, 1812, to the Quartermaster-General and Commissary-General of the Army.

July 6, 1812, to the Adjutant-General and Inspector-General of the Army.

February 27, 1813, to the vaccine agent.

March 3, 1813, to the sundry staff officers.

July 13, 1813, to the superintendent of general military supplies.

July 24, 1813, to the Commissioner of the Revenue.

April 18, 1814, to the same, without regard to weight.

February 7, 1815, to the Commissioner of the Navy.

March 3, 1815, to the collectors of direct taxes and internal duties.

April 9, 1816, to the commissioner of claims.

April 28, 1816, to the assessors of direct taxes.

April 29, 1816, to the additional accountant of the War Department.

March 1, 1817, to James Madison.

March 3, 1817, to the Second Comptroller and Auditor of the Treasury.

April 14, 1818, to the Commissary-General of Subsistence.

March 13, 1820, to the President pro tempore of the Senate, and Speaker, without regard to weight.

March 3, 1825, the general laws relating to the Post-Office Department were again codified, and in this act the officers were again designated who were entitled to the franking privilege, and it was made to include all of the foregoing. The only alteration was in extending the time during which the member of Congress could frank. Instead of limiting it to the session and twenty days after, he was allowed the privilege sixty days before, during, and sixty days after the session.

March 2, 1827, the franking privilege was granted to Navy Commissioners, Adjutant-General, Commissary-General, Inspector-General, Quartermaster-General, Paymaster-General, Secretary of the Senate, Clerk of the House of Representatives, and Superintendent of the Patent Office.

April 3, 1828, the Speaker was allowed to frank without regard to weight.

May 23, 1828, the franking privilege was granted to Charles Carroll.

May 29, 1830, to the Solicitor of the Treasury.

February 25, 1831, to the commission under Denmark treaty.

July 9, 1832, to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

July 13, 1832, to the commisson under French treaty.

March 2, 1833, to the commission under treaty with Naples.

March 2, 1833, to the Commissioner of Pensions.

March 2, 1833, extended the franking privilege of members of Congress from sixty days before and after each session, so as to include the time from sixty days before he takes his seat until the meeting of the next Congress; that is, it gave him the right for nearly a year besides the session.

June 30, 1834, the franking privilege was granted to governors of States for books, &c.

June 7, 1833, to the Spanish commission.

July 2, 1836, to the Auditor for the Post-Office and Chief Engineer.

July 2, 1836, to the widow of James Madison.

March 3, 1837, to the Commissioner of Pensions.

July 5, 1838, to the Commanding General, Colonel of Ordnance, Surgeon-General, head Topographical Corps.

September 9, 1841, to the widow of W. H. Harrison.

For a number of years the whole question of the franking privilege and the condition of the Post-Office Department was under discussion, and the result was that in 1845 the Post-Office Department was thoroughly reorganized, cheaper rates of postage were adopted, and the franking privilege was really extended, though many former abuses of it were corrected. Previous to 1845 the free distribution of public documents, printed by the order of either House, had been provided for by an entirely separate law from that governing the free transmission of letters and other mail matter, and was regarded as a separate subject, to be protected by itself.

December 19, 1821:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Members of Congress, the Delegates from Territories, the Secretary of the Senate, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized to transmit, free of postage, to any post-office within the United States or the Territories thereof, any documents which have been or may be printed by order of either House.

January 13, 1831:

Be it enacted, &c., That nothing contained in the act to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the Post-Office Department, approved March 3, 1825, shall be construed to repeal or limit the operation of the act authorizing the transmission of certain documents free of postage, approved December 19, 1821.

This explanatory act of June 13, 1831, shows that the members of Congress of that day regarded it important to distribute public documents among the people, and looked upon it as entirely independent of the privilege of franking letters and packets.

The bill proposed to-day by the committee is in effect restoring the law of December 19, 1821, and nothing else, only it throws more safeguards around it to prevent any abuse of it than were in the old law.

After a thorough examination the law of 1845 was passed, which practically continued in force until the repeal of the franking privilege, in 1873.

March 3, 1845:

SEC. 5. That the twenty-seventh section, act of Congress entitled "An act to reduce into one the several acts for establishing and regulating the Post-Office Department," approved and signed the 3d day of March, 1825, and all other acts and parts of acts granting and conferring upon any person whatsoever the right or privilege to receive and transmit through the mail, free of postage, letters, packets, newspapers, periodicals, or other matters, be, and the same are hereby, utterly abrogated and repealed.

SEC. 6. Officers of Government having had the franking privilege are to keep an account of postage, and said account is to be paid quarterly out of the contingent fund.

SEC. 7. That the act of Congress entitled "An act authorizing the governors of the several States to transmit by mail certain books and documents," approved June 30, 1834, shall remain and continue in full force, anything hereinbefore to the contrary notwithstanding, and the Members of Congress, the Delegates from Territories, the Secretary of the Senate, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, shall be, and they are hereby, authorized to transmit free of postage, to any post-office within the United States or the Territories thereof, any documents which have been or may be printed by order of either House of Congress, anything in this law to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 8. That each Member of the Senate, each Member of the House of Representatives, and each Delegate from a Territory of the United States, the Secretary of the Senate, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, may, during each session of Congress, and for a period of thirty days before the commencement and thirty days after the end of each and every session of Congress, send and receive through the mail, free of postage, any letter, newspaper, or packet, not exceeding two ounces in weight; and all postage charged upon any letters, packages, petitions, memorials, or other matters or things received during any session of Congress by any Senator, Member, or Delegate of the House of Representatives, touching his official or legislative duties, by reason of any excess of weight above two ounces of the matter or thing so received, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of which the person receiving the same may be a member. And they shall have the right to frank written letters from themselves during the whole year, as now authorized by law.

From the foregoing it would appear clear that the franking privilege was wholly abolished, the whole past wiped out, and a new start taken. In the new law the privilege was given to a smaller number. All the executive officer of the Government who had been enjoying the franking privilege were obliged to keep an account of the cost of postage, which was paid out of the contingent fund, and the frank was limited to members of Congress, the Secretary of the Senate, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives. They were allowed to frank any documents printed by order of either House, at any time during the year, and without regard to weight. They could send and receive all letters and packets, not exceeding two ounces in weight, for thirty days before, during, and thirty days after each session, free of postage. They could frank all letters from themselves during the whole year.

March 1, 1847, members of Congress and others again designated as having right to send and receive documents and letters free of postage during term of office and up to the first Monday December following expiration of term of office.

March 2, 1847, the franking privilege granted to deputy postmasters.

March 3, 1847, to soldiers of the army in Mexico.

May 27, 1848, to Commissioner of Pensions.

June 10, 1850, to widow of James K. Polk.

July 18, 1850, to widow of Z. Taylor.

May 23, 1850, to United States marshals, on all matter relating to the census.

February 2, 1854, to Superintendent Coast Survey and assistant.

March 3, 1855, to all Vice-Presidents during life.

March 3, 1855, to all books, &c., sent to Smithsonian Institution, or Library of Congress for copyright.

May 15, 1862, to Commissioner of Agriculture.

July 1, 1862, to Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

July 5, 1862, to chiefs of Bureaus of Navy Department.

March 3, 1863:

SEC. 42. Be it enacted, &c., That authority to frank mail matter is conferred upon and limited to the following persons: First, the President of the United States, by himself, or his Private Secretary; second, the Vice-President of the United States; third, the chiefs of the several Executive Departments; fourth, such principal officers, being heads of Bureaus or chief clerks, of each Executive Department, to be used only for official communications, as the Postmaster-General shall by regulation prescribe; fifth, Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States, including Delegates from Territories, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives; to cover correspondence to and from them, and all printed matter used by authority of Congress, and all speeches, proceedings, and debates in Congress, and all printed matter sent to them; their franking privilege to commence with the term for which they are elected and to expire on the first Monday of December following such term of office; sixth, all official communications addressed to either of the Executive Departments of Government by an officer responsible to that Department, &c.; seventh, postmasters have also the franking privilege for their official communications to other postmasters, &c.; eighth, petitions to either branch of Congress shall pass free in the mails; ninth, all communications addressed to any of the franking officers above described and not excepted in the foregoing clauses must be prepaid by postage-stamps. The franking privilege hereinbefore granted shall be limited to packages weighing not exceeding four ounces, except petitions to Congress and congressional or executive documents, and such publications or books as have or may be published, procured, or purchased by order of either House of Congress, or a joint resolution of the two Houses, which shall be considered as public documents, and entitled to be franked as such, and except also seeds, cuttings, roots, and scions, the weight of the packages of which may be fixed by regulation of the Postmaster-General.

March 16, 1864, the franking privilege of the President and the Vice-President extends to all matter to and from them.

June 30, 1864, the franking privilege granted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

March 3, 1865, to the Commissioner Internal Revenue.

February 10, 1866, to the widow of Abraham Lincoln.

July 13, 1866, to assessors, collectors, assistant assessors, and deputy collectors, between each other.

July 13, 1866, to the Special Commissioner of the Revenue.

July 28, 1866, to the Director of the Bureau of Statistics.

March 9, 1868, to the Congressional Printer.

March 1, 1869, the franking privilege to be exercised only by the written autograph signature.

July 8, 1870, the franking privilege granted to the Commissioner of Patents.

Such is a history of the laws passed upon this subject, and from this record it will be seen that from a time anterior to the foundation of the Government up to the year 1873 the franking privilege was extended to all the legislative as well as all the executive officers of the Government; and if any preference was exhibited, it was in favor of enlarging the powers of the legislative branch, and especially in favor of distributing the public documents, about which there seems to have been no dispute. While no actual change was made in the policy of the Government, let us see if any attempts were made to abolish this privilege; and if so, when, and what comparative support they received.

I have shown that the frank was a privilege bequeathed us by the old Confederation, and continued, as received, for many years. On the 20th of January, 1790, Samuel Osgood, the first Postmaster-General, in his report, recommended the continuance of the frank. The next mention of it I can find is on the 4th of April, 1796, when the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, first session Fourth Congress, recommended an extension of the frank, and on the 8th of January, 1799, third session Fifth Congress, Joseph Habersham commends the benefits to be derived from the frank, and indorses its continuance; and thus year after year rolled by with no recorded evidence, either in legislation or in reports of committees, to show that any dissatisfaction existed in regard to the franking privilege. During the Fifth and Twenty-third Congresses attention was called to some abuses of it, which were individual, and against the person abusing it, and not against the system. In the second session Twenty-seventh Congress, during Tyler's term, owing to financial difficulties, a select committee on retrenchment went to work to close every avenue of expense and to swell the sources of revenue, and they reported among other things "Report of House of Representatives 452, to accompany House bill 292, March, 1842." This report favors the abolition of the franking privilege as a question of finance; yet it says, nevertheless, that the right to frank was given to "facilitate intercourse on the public business between the people and the Government." In urging their report they say:

> There are about three hundred persons in Congress who are in the constant habit of franking; they send all kinds of mail matter, and it costs as much to send free as paid matter.

If postage was paid on this a large amount would be saved, and they presented the following figures, furnished by Hon. C. A. Wickliffe, Postmaster-General, showing the amount of mail matter transmitted free in one week, in June, 1838, from the Washington, District of Columbia, post-office:

Total number of free letters	7,585
Total number of free documents, pounds	5,131
Postage on 7,585 letters would be	$1,137 75
Postage on 5,131 pounds of documents would be	2,924 66
Total postage on free matter for one week	4,062 41

Notwithstanding the desire to economize, the representatives of the people did not agree with the committee; so the subject rested until the next year, first session Twenty-eighth Congress, when the whole question was again referred to a committee and elaborately discussed. The result of this discussion is worthy of note; for while the minority of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads reported in favor of abolishing the frank in Report House of Representatives No. 483, to accompany House bill No. 389, May 15, 1844, the select committee reported on the 15th of June, 1844, that the deputy postmasters and officers of the Post-Office Department had violated the law and the right of the member to frank by erasing his name in many instances and compelling him to pay postage, and by subjecting his mail to delay and scrutiny. (See Report House of Representatives No. 576, first session Twenty-eighth Congress.)

The committee say they were satisfied the postmasters did it in pursuance of orders from the Postmaster-General, and called upon him for an explanation. They believed the Postmaster-General did it from praiseworthy motives and to correct abuses. The restrictions of franking upon members were as to time, weight, and origin of letters franked. The restrictions of time and weight are of such a nature that the postmaster can decide upon them; they admit of no question; but the restriction upon the origin, whether written by himself, is not left to the numberless thousands of postmasters, but to the member, and upon violation is to be prosecuted by the Post-Office Department, and a remedy by prosecution precludes the other remedy contemplated by the regulations of the Post-Office Department.

The Postmaster-General, C. A. Wickliffe, in his reply to the committee, says:

> These instructions were dictated in no unfriendly spirit to the legitimate exercise of that privilege, but originated in a desire (which I am sure all who have this privilege conferred upon them should feel) to check its abuse.

All these reports show the overwhelming sentiment in favor of the franking privilege at that time, and the law of 1845, already referred to, was the result of the first agitation of the question. From that time until 1860 the question was in abeyance, except in 1848, when the subject was slightly discussed. A select committee was appointed in 1860, who made a very full and elaborate report against any change, from which I have already largely quoted.

Such is the past history of the franking privilege, and the efforts to abolish it. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads now propose to restore a part of the privileges conferred by the old law. This bill abolishes the individual frank altogether, leaves the Department business to be conducted as at present, i. e., one Department of the Government buys postage-stamps of the other, and simply provides for the distribution of public documents and seeds, by a plan of countersigned stamps, entirely safe, and free from any charge of fraud or abuse. This bill excludes the legislative members of the Government from sending off anything but public printed documents and seeds; while the executive officers continue to be furnished with stamps to conduct their correspondence. This distinction gives rise to the inquiry why the executive letters pass free and the legislative do not, for to furnish with official stamps is to pass free. No good reason can be given, and the inquiry must remain unanswered, though reasons might be given for the reverse, i. e., for allowing the legislative dispatches to pass free, and not the executive.

I quote from the report again:

> In a majority of countries where postal systems exist there is no Legislature at all; in others it is but a shadow; in some, merely an office wherein to register the decrees of royalty. If in any such the right to transmit through the king's mails any matter free is conceded to the semblance, the Legislature, it is strictly a privilege or possibly a sort of badge of office or distinction. It is a matter of grace, like the license to kill deer in the royal forests, blowing a horn if the forester be absent, so that the king's "venison may not seem to be taken by stealth." In all such states there is little need for sympathy or communication between the representative and the constituent, since elections in some are but mere forms, and in others the executive is the real and sometimes in whole or in part the formal constituent of the Legislature. In but one country besides our own has the legislative department any real and substantial portion of the power of the government, and even there the post-office system grew up under the auspices of royalty, at a period when Parliaments were but the registers of the king's good will and pleasure.
> Postal couriers were employed by King John to convey government dispatches as early as the thirteenth century, and between that period and the reign of James I, when the first postmaster-general, having charge of as well private as public correspondence, was appointed, nothing probably but official letters and packets was transmitted by the king's post. From the beginning down to the time of the Long Parliament the entire system was under the control of the executive as a part of the royal prerogative, and posts were established by proclamation. When, in the time of Cromwell, both king and lords were abolished and all power consolidated at first in the House of Commons, the post-office passed also under their control, and they succeeded, of course, to the rights and privileges of the executive, and used the mails for the conveyance of their own dispatches and intelligence. Blackstone dates the first legislative establishment and regulation of the post-office from this period. At the restoration, in 1660, the system, though then and ever afterward subject to control by act of Parliament instead of royal proclamation, passed again in its administration into the hands of the king. Pending a bill in the same year for the organization of the post-office, the Commons, "because that the letters of, as well the king's council of state as his own and other executive officers, passed free through the mails," added a proviso that their letters also should be entitled to the same privilege. The Lords threw out the proviso, and the Commons consented to drop it upon a private assurance from the Crown that the exemption should be allowed to the members, and accordingly a warrant was ever afterward regularly issued from the king to the postmaster-general directing the allowance to members of Parliament of free letters to the extent of two ounces. This was the origin of the "franking privilege," for privilege it then really was, granted of royal grace; and so it continued for a century, when in 1764 it was for the first time confirmed and regulated by act of Parliament.

Under our Constitution Congress has full power to establish a postal system, and to pass all laws necessary for its complete maintenance, so that the people of the United States may derive all the benefits accruing from a progressive postal system if they so desire. The desires and wishes of the people become the duty of the Government, and the Constitution furnishes the power. This power is absolute; no individual or State authority can intervene; necessarily absolute because supreme control is essential to efficiency.

The general theory of our Government is to allow the largest liberty compatible with the prosperity of all, and to allow the citizen in his individual capacity, instead of the nation, to perform all the minor duties of government which he can do as well. Cannot the individual citizen, like Adams Express Company, carry the mail as well as the Government? Did it not for many years, and until directly prohibited by law, compete successfully with the United States mail in regard to speed, regularity, and safety? Can it not do it to-day, and would it not unless prohibited by law? Certainly. And yet the Government is the exclusive carrier of the mail; directly prohibits any one else from carrying it; and, while carrying it, carries nothing else.

Absolute power and exclusive control are given because the nation has the right to send its own communications and intelligence by its own means and conveyance to its own officers, agents, and citizens. The Government has just the same power to establish post-offices and post-roads, and control their administration, as it has to construct ships of war and equip them for actual service.

I will not answer those assertions which deny exclusive control over the post-office system of the country to the Government of the United States, beyond the reply already made; neither will I discuss those opinions which have been advocated, to abandon it to private enterprise, for it must be obvious to the most casual observer that such a vast power ought never to have been given except in carrying out plans whose completion would confer public benefits upon the people at large. And when the Post-Office Department is no longer used by the Government for the advancement of the interests of the Government, and to the exclusion of all private interest, should there be any conflict between the public and private interests, but is used only in the same way and upon the same terms as a private individual would use it, then the whole of this Government monopoly, this costly express business, with its vast political power and patronage, ought to be speedily abolished and thoroughly eradicated.

One other way is for the Government to send all its letters and messages by a special messenger of its own, as it now does when sending an important communication abroad or to countries where there is no post-office system, and as many of the half-civilized nations now do. The expense of such a system would soon cause its rejection, for each messenger would have to be paid out of the public Treasury, entailing an expense compared with which the cost of the frank would be small indeed. The Government might send its communications by private carriers or express companies under contract, or at established rates open alike to the public and the Government. The expense, however, would be great, only exceeded by the plan of sending by special messengers, and would come out of the national Treasury as before, for in none of these cases would the officer sending the letter be expected to pay the postage out of his own pocket. In all of these cases, however, the Government is practically within the power of individuals; and while it might be endured in times of peace and prosperity, it could not be tolerated for a moment in times of war, for the safety of the Government itself might depend upon its having the absolute control of its own communications. The question of existence, therefore, as well as of expense, enters into the consideration of the free delivery of Government matter.

But the great argument against the franking privilege is the expense it occasions the Post-Office Department, and no consideration is given the very valid reasons for it. Every postal system, of every government from the beginning, has been established for the purpose of transmitting intelligence—intelligence between the government and its agent, or else between the government and its citizens. The very nature of this matter presents a sufficient reason for its transmission by the Government exclusively; another reason is to avoid the complications and rivalries which might arise between the States themselves in the transmission of matter from one State to another, if it were left to individuals of different States, or even to the States themselves.

The committee from whose report I have previously quoted say:

> They are of opinion that whereas the transportation of Government dispatches and intelligence was the primary object of the establishment of the post-office system, so, also, it is still, and much more now than at first, the chief reason which justifies its continuance; and that whenever it ceases to be a department of state, to be used in the exercise and execution of some legitimate and necessary function and power of republican government, it ought to be abolished.

The post-office is a part of the Government, to be used for the public benefit, just as the other Departments are, and does not differ from them in any way; and there is no more reason why it should be self-sustaining than is the Navy, War, or Interior Department. It is very true that private citizens do not make use of any of the other Departments for their own convenience or pleasure, while they do use the Post-Office Department. The reason, however, is plain. The private use of the Post-Office Department does not destroy either its efficiency or the purpose for which it was created; on the contrary, it can carry the letter of the citizen at the same time as it does that of the Government, and without any injury to the service; and, by exacting sufficient postage, without any cost to the Government. This last sentence covers the whole question in controversy, for it is simply a question of dollars and cents and not of principle, which causes the discussion. Let us see. By exacting sufficient postage the carrying of private letters would not cost the Government anything. Government must send by its own messengers and employés all Government and official letters and documents; and if, in addition, it can carry the private correspondence of its individual citizens, so that the revenues derived from the citizens will pay for the proportional expense of transmitting the private correspondence, and the deficit in the Post-Office Department will be just about the fair proportion for the Government to pay on the public correspondence, then the public will be accommodated at fair and reasonable rates and by reliable and unfailing means, and the Government will not only secure the delivery of its own matter at the same reasonable rates—much cheaper than it could by any other plan—but will also, as it should, accommodate its citizens in promoting their happiness and welfare, and will at the same time have that exclusive control over the postal system which a government should have over such an important matter as its communications within its own borders and with the outside world, and an interruption in which—such as might occur without such control—would prove fatal to the Government itself.

After the Government has organized a complete and enduring system for the transmission of its own communications and intelligence, and the benefits of which it extends to its own citizens, because it secures those citizens greater speed and security than they can obtain from private parties, why should the Government be expected and required to pay the system for carrying its communications when the expenses of the system itself are borne by the Government?

The deficit of the Post-Office Department is not that the free matter runs the Department in debt, but the receipts from the private correspondence do not equal the expenses occasioned by it; and if all Government matter was out of the mails, and the Department carried private correspondence only, just about the same deficit would occur as exists now. In other words, the Government more than pays for the transmission of its own matter.

Years ago one of the complaints against the Post-Office Department—and the Department would have all it could do to prevent a similar one now but for the law prohibiting it—was that private persons or express companies could carry daily newspapers quicker and safer than the Post-Office Department. The present efficient management of the Department prevents any competition in anything but newspapers, which owing to the hours of publication may be sent by express on earlier trains than the mail trains. And yet, why not let private enterprise carry the mails if time and money are the only objects? The very opponents of the franking privilege say that the Government cannot afford to be at the mercy of private enterprise in such a way. The Government must have a service of its own and under its own control. If so, why should the Government pay for the work done by its own hired employés? It is simply taking the money from one pocket and putting it in another.

Some say the citizen is taxed a higher rate of postage than fair in order to pay the expenses of transporting his own and the Government mails. Such is not the case. The experience of the Post-Office Department for the last six months contradicts any such assumption. The deficit is just as large as ever, and clearly proves that the receipts from the private correspondence do not equal the expense occasioned by it.

The deficiency for 1872 was		$3,317,765
The deficiency for 1873 was		$5,265,475
Estimated deficiency for 1874	$4,636,363
Amount of official postage supplied to Departments	2,500,000
Being an increase over the year 1873 of		1,870,888

No one would propose to tax the citizen with too high a rate of postage, but simply tax him sufficiently to pay his share and let the Government pay its proportion. If this is done, the question will then be, shall the Government pay directly the deficiency in the Post-Office Department—which deficit represents the amount of work actually done for the United States, or the excess of expenditures above receipts, after charging the citizen a fair rate of postage for the work done for him—or shall it pay the same indirectly in the shape of postage for every department for which an appropriation must be made from the Treasury? In other words, shall the Government keep a postage account with each department, and either appropriate money to be liberally drawn out on sub-vouchers, which would be an enormous source of loss and peculation; or else appropriate official postage-stamps, which can be illegally used just as well and even better than the frank, and the printing of which is a considerable item of expense; or shall it transmit its official dispatches free, without any red tape, and save all the expense which this circumlocution involves?

Another great objection urged against the franking privilege, (and it had weight with those who were disposed to allow the frank if it could be legitimately exercised,) was that it was a great source of fraud. I do not imagine a jury would find as severe a punishment against a man who wrongfully used an office postage-stamp as against one who should forge a man's name upon a letter. So the liability to abuse will not be as strong then as now. Let us examine the figures, and see whether the abuse is greater or not, from the report of the Postmaster-General urging the repeal of the franking privilege. I quote a statement of officials exercising the franking privilege:

Members of the Cabinet	7
United States Senators	74
Members of Congress	241
Delegates in Congress	5
Secretary of Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives	2
Assistant Secretaries, chief clerk, &c., State Department	4
Assistant Attorney-General and chief clerk	2
Assistant Secretary, Commissioners, chief clerk, &c., Interior Department	13
Chiefs of Bureaus, chief clerks, &c., of Navy Department	17
Chiefs of Bureaus, chief clerks, &c., of War Department	21
Assistant Secretaries, chief clerks, &c., of the Treasury Department	42
Assistant Postmasters-General, superintendents of foreign mails and money-order system, and chief clerks Post-Office Department	9
	440
Add internal-revenue officers, (assessors and assistant collectors and deputies)	4,115
Postmasters on 1st November, 1869	27,378
Total	31,933

This has been reduced to below thirty thousand by the assistant assessors since legislated out of office. From the replies of the Cabinet officers as to the number of persons to whom official stamps are furnished, I learn that there are nearly forty thousand officers who have the unlimited use of official stamps. There is nothing to prevent them from using these stamps upon their private correspondence, nothing to prevent other clerks and employés from using them also; indeed, the temptation is strong to do so, and the chance of detection is much less than it would be in forging the signature of some person entitled to the frank.

The fact is, all the officers who used to frank, now have these stamps furnished them, and many also who did not frank, so that the number of persons who can send dispatches free is greatly increased, and there is no saving in this respect.

There is no reason why the legislative as well as the executive officers of the Government should not have the right to frank letters. Under the present law stamps are furnished all the executive officers, and it is only the members of Congress who have to pay postage upon official business out of their own private means. It is an imposition upon them; it is levying an unjust tax upon the public servant which is demanded in no other branch of the public service, except in the Post-Office Department, and is not allowed in the post-office department of any other country. You might as reasonably expect to make the soldier provide his own arms and ammunition, the sailor to furnish his own ship, the judge to hire the court-room, and the collector of customs to furnish the custom-house, with or in which they all perform service for the United States, out of their own private means, as to expect members of Congress to pay for the Government business.

Let us see how it works practically. Each member receives hundreds of letters upon business connected with the Departments, asking for books, for seeds, &c. Each letter requires an answer, and each book and package of seeds requires an expenditure of money, which is so small in each individual case that a member cannot refuse or neglect to send it without rendering himself liable to the charge of meanness, and yet when he has complied with all of the demands of this kind he will find that his expenditures have run up into the hundreds. It does seem mean to refuse to send a constituent an Agricultural Report, who has been to the trouble and takes sufficient interest in it to write for it, simply because the postage is forty-two, forty-four, or forty-eight cents, and yet, when you have, during one Congress, about twelve hundred to send out, costing five or six hundred dollars, you feel inclined to dissent.

But let us come nearer the home of the Postmaster-General, and see what expense we, as members of Congress, are called upon to undergo by the requirements of custom and the Postmaster-General. It has been the custom whenever a vacancy occurs in any one of the almost innumerable cross-roads post-offices in each district, (and there were nearly three hundred in mine,) for the First Assistant Postmaster-General to send me a written notice of the vacancy, with the request either to recommend some one myself for the place, or else to state whether some one already recommended is a suitable person. Under the present plan, i. e., since the abolition of the franking privilege, the Post-Office Department inclose, with the request, a stamp to pay the postage on my reply to them; so, if I should happen to know any man competent, and willing to take the office, I suggest his name to the First Assistant Postmaster-General, and, on my reply, use the stamp furnished me, and so it does not cost me anything for postage; but if I do not know any one wanting the place, who is competent and reliable—and such is the fact in ninety-nine out of a hundred cases—I am compelled to write to some person in that neighborhood in whom I have confidence, and ask him who is a suitable person for the position, and whether he will take it if appointed; and as it is on Government business which in no wise concerns him, and it is not right that he should pay the postage, I, of course, inclose him a stamp for his reply to my letter. This, with the stamp on the letter I send, makes six cents, at the very lowest estimate.

In the majority of cases the correspondence is much more extended; and when you take into consideration that each member has at least one hundred such cases each Congress, you can see that quite a bill accumulates each year for postage on business in the appointment room of the Post-Office Department; and when you take into further consideration the fact that the appointment branch is but one portion of the Post-Office Department, and that each member receives an equal number of letters upon the subject of contracts, and an equal number, again, upon the subject of auditing and paying accounts, and a great many upon general subjects, such as salaries, money-orders, &c., all requiring answers, you run up a bill for postage upon public business against the Post-Office Department itself, to say nothing of similar charges against the other six Departments, which is actually burdensome upon the member and an imposition upon him.

All necessary public expenses, incurred in the discharge of a public duty should be paid for out of the Treasury, because the service performed is for the general good. It is not done with the post-office business, because the desire is to make the Post-Office Department self-sustaining. And yet why should it be more than the Treasury, Interior, War, or Navy Department? There is no reason in the world why the Post-Office Department should be in receipt of a revenue beyond a fair remuneration for carrying private letters, or receive compensation for the public work performed more than the other Departments.

Every communication from one officer to another upon public business is a part of the duty of that officer, and should pass free to the officer. This, I think, will be acknowledged by all; and the Postmaster-General recommends that it continue so, and that stamps be furnished all executive officers, first, because letters passing from one officer to another, upon public business, should be paid for by the public; and, secondly, the people should be kept informed of the action of their servants, to hold them to a strict accountability; and it is proper that the people, and not the servant, should pay the expense of it.

Every one recognizes these reasons as valid, and no change is asked for so far as the executive is concerned. The same reasons which demand the free transmission of matter from the executive department, also justify the extension of the privilege to the legislative department.

We are the representatives and agents of the people. They cannot hold us responsible unless thoroughly advised of our actions and familiar with the way we discharge our duties. It is important for the purity, prosperity, and integrity of our institutions that the people should be kept thoroughly informed of the doings of their representatives, so as to preserve the intimate relationship now existing between them and the people. It is even more important that the doings of the legislative department should be made known, because that is the initiatory of the three great branches of the Government. Everything depends upon its action. With it rests the duty of forcing the other departments to do right, and pecially of enforcinSes responsibility upon the executive. Thus it stands as the originator and defender of the rights of the people. With the law as it stands now, there is no public communication between Congress and the people. The Agricultural Department may send out seeds or agricultural reports, or any Department may send out its own documents free. The Post-Office Department may communicate with the people, and any other Department may do the same, or they can communicate with each other; but Congress cannot do so, unless, perchance, it should do so through them.

Why should the congressional any more than the executive public servant be required to pay the expense of a public communication out of his own private resources? The fundamental idea of our free Government is that the officer is responsible to his constituents, and, if so, the constituents cannot judge correctly of his efficiency and faithfulness, unless placed in frequent communication with him, neither can they enforce that responsibility except through free intercourse. Other means of communication may be prejudiced, biased, or perverted; so that constituents should hear directly and officially from the member what has been said and done by him—the expense to be borne by the parties benefited, the public. Why concede to the executive branch of the Government what you deny to the legislative, when the tendency to strengthen the executive at the expense of the others weakens the Government itself. There is nothing in the Constitution, laws, or tendency of our Government to confer such a power upon the executive and not upon the legislative department.

Another reason given against its restoration is that a large number of costly books and public documents would be printed, to be paid for out of the Treasury, which would not be printed but for the franking privilege. This is no valid argument against the frank; it is really begging the question. All books are published by order of Congress; consequently none can be franked if Congress deems it injudicious to, and does not, print. Whenever a worthless book is presented, it is only necessary to refuse to print to save the cost of both printing and transmitting. Whenever a book is pronounced worthy and has been printed, then common sense demands that its contents should be made known to the people, free to them as citizens and without burdening their servants. What books are consigned to oblivion by the opponents of this bill? They are the reports of the official doings of the various Departments; reports of the officers, official record of the laws of the United States; reports of the Agricultural and Patent Office Departments, commercial and foreign relations, and the thousand and one other transactions of an immense Government like ours, which become a part of the record history of our nation, and ought to be printed and distributed, for the people have the right to see them, and ought to see them, so as to act intelligently upon the various questions submitted for their action. To accomplish this they should be sent through the mails free. Congress may have printed useless books, and might do so if this bill were passed. The fault does dot lie in the law, but in Congress itself in authorizing it; therefore let the remedy be applied at the proper place, and not indirectly by stopping the frank.

Another complaint is that thousands of documents and speeches are franked, especially during a presidential campaign, and the facility of sending to his constituents the opinion of the member himself encourages the habit of speech-making to an undue extent. I am aware that we do not place a very high value upon each other's speeches; and yet members are much above the average of their constituents in intelligence, prepare their remarks with care, and generally collect information of benefit to their people. If the speech then benefits the masses of the people, send out thousands more. Each one is read by a voter, who thereby acquires an additional knowledge of the administration of affairs in the country and the political condition and principles of the parties desiring to govern it. On the score of economy to the member himself it were better, perhaps, that he did not have this special privilege; for without it he will confine himself to business letters, while with it he will pay for printing his own speeches. The constituent who reads the speech announces by his ballot his opinion upon the question, and in that simple act indicates his wishes and actions more than he could do in a day's argument. It is essential that he be supplied with the public documents and speeches which will so inform him that he will cast his ballot and influence correctly. They afford instruction, and make public sentiment, and have been the means of educating the people up to many an innovating improvement. These speeches are printed at the private cost of the member himself, which is a very heavy burden; they convey public information, and should go free.

I am in favor of an entire restoration of the franking privilege, though as a member of the committee I shall vote for the bill as it comes from the committee, without amendment.

This bill does not contemplate a restoration of the franking privilege in any sense whatever. It simply provides a safe way of sending off by mail the valuable public documents and seeds furnished by the Government; freeing the method of transmission from all the complaints of abuses formerly urged against it. It allows the interchange of publications, and provides also for the free circulation of weekly papers in the counties in which they are issued.

This discussion has, as yet, failed to develop any opposition to the last two propositions; so I shall take it for granted there is none. The provisions of the bill in regard to the public documents and seeds are so carefully drawn, that abuse under it will be impossible.

The Clerk of the House places an official stamp upon the book or document, just as a stamp is now placed upon an official letter at one of the Departments. In order to prevent any misuse of the stamp, or the transmission of any but public documents, the member must put his signature upon it as formerly. This serves two purposes: it prevents the stamp being used upon anything but a public document, and it informs the constituent that he is indebted to his member for the document.

All the gentlemen who oppose this bill contend that the franking privilege, outside of the cost of printing, occasions an enormous outlay to the Government. Those who advocate the bill generally contend that the outlay is much less than claimed and not at all commensurate with the benefits to be derived. I shall go much further in my declaration, and assert that the additional expense incurred under the present plan fully equals, if it does not exceed, the cost of the frank; of course I mean the legitimate cost, not any imaginary frauds or abuses as figured up on paper. At present the only actual saving to the Government is in the amount of postage actually paid by members of Congress, and this amount is quite small, as I will show.

If the same number of books and documents were sent out now as were formerly franked, and the postage was paid on each one, of course the receipts of the Post-Office Department would be increased by that amount and the expectations of the advocates of an increased revenue would be realized; but the same number of books are not sent out now, and of those sent out but a small proportion pay postage, so the Post-Office Department is not increasing its revenue from this source, while the people are losing the information previously furnished.

From the superintendent of the folding-room I learn that there were furnished to each member of the Forty-second Congress 3,339 books and pamphlets; total weight, 11,157 pounds; total postage, $1,785.14; average postage 46 cents on each document.

It will be observed that the postage for one year would be $892.57. I am also informed that not one-tenth as many books are now sent out as formerly, and that of those sent out nine out of ten are sent by express, and only one out of ten goes by mail. So the amount collected from members of Congress for postage on documents will not average for each member ten dollars. We will suppose, however, he sends out the same number of letters as before, say an average of twenty-five letters each day for three hundred days; these, at three cents each, would make $225, making a total of $235 postage per annum for each member, as against $1,117 in previous years. Say three hundred Members, at $235 postage each, $70,500; say seventy-four Senators, at $352.50 postage each, or at 150 per cent. more, $26,085, making a total of $96,585, say $100,000 in round numbers; which I believe will fully cover the amount of money actually paid by Congress for postage of all kinds.

I am fully convinced that the Postmaster-General will not receive more than $100,000 cash postage each year from members of Congress, and as that is the only amount of cash he does receive for postage from those who formerly enjoyed the frank, I am afraid that is the only amount he can place to the credit of his account in consequence of the abolition of the franking privilege. All the officials and other persons who used to frank now have official postage-stamps furnished them, and while the revenues of the Post-Office Department may show some increase on paper the expenses of the other Departments will show an equal increase, as acknowledged by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in his remarks the other day:

I admit that to abolish the frank for the Executive Departments and to issue official postage-stamps is in itself no saving of money. This has apparently swelled our appropriations for the current year by almost $2,000,000; and yet the $2,000,000 worth of stamps authorized to be used actually cost the Government less than $8,000. So that an actual expenditure of $8,000 in money appears on the books of the Treasury as an expenditure of $2,000,000. That is one of the items which made the appropriations of the last Congress appear larger than they really were.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations admits, then, that the only result in abolishing the frank, so far as the Executive Departments are concerned, is to create an expenditure of $8,000. Members of Congress, I have just shown, pay in cash $100,000. Now, let us see what the franking privilege cost the legislative part of the Government last year:

74 Senators, at $1,117; add 50 per cent., $558.50, for each Senator, making total postage $1,675.50 for each Senator	123,987 00
Total	459,087 00

I believe that $500,000 each year covered the postage on documents and letters formerly franked by members of Congress, and I further believe that the report of the Postmaster-General will corroborate my statement. In this connection I present the statement found on page 8, Executive Document No. 22, first session Forty-third Congress, of the number of post-offices and length of post-roads in the United States, the annual amount paid for mail-transportation, and the amounts of postal revenues and expenditures, at periods of five years from 1790 to 1840, inclusive, and in each year from 1840 to 1873, inclusive, and the cost of the railroad portion of the transportation, from the date of the commencement thereof. From which it will be seen that, keeping pace with the growth of the country, the regular rate of increase in the revenues of the Post-Office Department is over $1,000,000 per annum, and has been for a number of years.

§ Railroad and steamboat service combined.

From the same I quote a statement exhibiting quarterly the receipts of the Post-Office Department, under their several heads, during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1873:

Receipts.	Quarter ending March 31, 1873.	Quarter ending June 30, 1873.
Letter postage	$95,658 47	$83,196 98
Newspapers and pamphlets	276,113 32	268,012 72
Fines	850 67	1,701 79
Emoluments	284,110 51	294,419 69
Postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal cards	5,310,054 35	5,227,055 15
Dead letters	1,096 00	1,117 00
Revenue from money-order business	.....	68,584 00
Miscellaneous	4,850 37	6,600 30
Total	5,972,733 59	5,950,687 63

From the same document I obtain the following statement of revenue for the quarter ending September 30, 1873:

Letter postage	$75,877 65
Book, newspaper, and pamphlet postage	342,785 50
Box rents	316,672 02
Postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal cards	5,297,292 80
Total	6,032,627 97
On the same four items for the quarter ending March 31, 1873, the receipts were	5,965,936 55
Making an increase of	66,691 42

But let us examine it for the last two consecutive quarters, for the last quarter under the frank and the first quarter without:

Receipts for quarter ending September 30, 1873, as above, were	$6,032,627 97
Receipts on the same items for the quarter ending June 30, 1873, were	5,872,684 54
Making an increase of	159,943 43

Now it will be remembered that the natural rate of increase in the revenue has been for a number of years over $1,000,000 per annum, which with the $2,500,000 the Postmaster-General said would be saved would make an increase of $3,500,000, which we might justly and reasonably look for. A comparison, therefore, shows that while there is some increase in the revenues of the Department, yet it is below the regular and natural increase, and we cannot find the slightest trace of the $2,500,000, or the slightest consolation for the advocates of the abolition of the frank.

It was often heralded forth that thousands and even millions of business circulars were fraudulently franked in New York. If so, there should be a large increase in the revenues of this office. The contrary is the case; there is a falling off.

Receipts at New York for the quarter ending June 30, 1873, (that is, the last quarter of the frank,) $647,517.35; receipts at New York for the quarter ending December 31, 1873, $626,643.13; showing a falling off of $20,774.22 in the city of New York alone in three months, or at the rate of $80,000 per annum. This shows no increase in the revenue such as one would naturally expect to find resulting from the increase of business in a growing city, and shows conclusively that the franking abuse could not have been extensive in New York, if it was not extensive enough, aided by the natural growth, to overcome any loss of revenue which might have been occasioned by the introduction of the postal card.

The fact is, and such also is the testimony of the New York postmaster, that the quantity of franked matter passing through the New York office was so infinitesimally small that no account whatever was ever taken of it, and it could hardly be discovered. If it can scarcely be noticed in the New York office, supplying as it does a million people, and in the very place where fraud would be carried on, if anywhere, it can hardly exist to any extent anywhere. The truth is ninety-nine hundredths of the free matter were franked through the Washington City post-office, and all the prejudices against it have been gathered from the impressions created here. The free matter here was very heavy compared with the total transmitted; in every other place it was merely nominal.

The greatest reliance is placed upon the account taken by the Postmaster-General of all free matter from January 1 to July 1, 1870, being a period of six months, and from it he derives his famous estimate of $2,500,000.

Here is the grand total:

From the above returns and estimates the following grand result is shown: Total number of franked letters for six months, 10,894,497—postage, $933,070; printed matter, &c., 2,655,196 pounds—postage, $338,593.85. Total postage for six months, $1,271,663.86; total for one year, $2,543,327.72.

Total postage for six months on documents, $338,593.85!

Although this account was taken during the time that Congress was in session, and when the largest proportion of the documents were sent off, yet we will call it a fair criterion; this would make for twelve months $677,187.70.

In the amount returned for letters, $935,070, on 10,894,497 letters, we find such an amount as to force us to the conclusion that all the official letters are included in the returns. I do not think any one will deny that, for to deny it would be to say that each member sent off 36,314 letters in six months, or 6,052 letters in one month, 201 per day.

Official matter sent out by any of the Departments with the official stamp upon it goes free now just as much as it used to, and is franked to-day just as much as it ever was, with this difference: to-day it is franked with a printed official stamp for which no one is responsible, while it was formerly franked by the written signature of the sender, for which he was always responsible.

There is practically no gain anywhere but in the postage paid by members of Congress; there can be none, for the number of persons using official stamps is greater than the number of persons who used to frank, and no restriction is placed upon the use of the stamp any more than formerly existed on the frank.

Having considered the actual cash gains to the Treasury, let us see if a saving has been made anywhere in consequence of the abolition of the frank. Are fewer clerks employed? Are cheaper contracts for transportation made? Is there any saving anywhere?

The Postmaster-General in his letter of January 20, 1874, acknowledges that there has been no saving in the number of clerks employed.

No employés in the postal service have been discharged in consequence of the abolition of the franking privilege.

The cost of transportation is not less, as the following figures will show, (page 12, Report Postmaster-General:)

For the year ending—
June 30, 1872	$14,773,346
June 30, 1873	16,174,003
June 30, 1874	18,357,931
June 30, 1875	19,270,986

Here is a steady increase, showing that no cheaper contracts have been made in consequence of it.

And when you say that the service has been extended, I reply it has been extended only as represented by this increased cost, not beyond it; for it is a well-known fact that the railroad companies are now threatening to withdraw their cars and refuse to carry the mails if their pay is not increased. Singular that they should make such a demand just at the time they were relieved of the heavy burdens imposed upon them by the frank.

The Postmaster-General does not attempt to show a single case where he has made a cheaper contract. I quote:

The answer to the first query shows that it is impracticable to state precisely "how much less is charged by railroads;" and there are no data from which to estimate the saving on the pay of "other carriers."

I propose to criticise the figures of the Postmaster-General freely, but shall endeavor to do him no injustice, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] did in his speech the other day when he accused him of a discrepancy in his estimates, as compared with the deficiency provided for in the Book of Estimates. An examination of the Book of Estimates, page 173, shows a deficiency of $6,811,363. This amount is made up of various items. The difference between the receipts and expenditures is appropriated out of the general Treasury, $4,636,363. Special appropriations to be provided for out of the general Treasury, such as China mail service, &c., $1,225,000; official stamps for Post-Office Department, $950. The receipts of the Post-Office Department are first appropriated to pay expenses, and then as much more is appropriated out of the general Treasury as may be necessary to meet the general deficiency and the special expenses. Page 2, appendix, Report of the Postmaster-General for 1873, shows exactly $6,811,363 as the deficiency—a perfect agreement.

His estimates here are based upon facts and figures, and are correct, but his estimates in regard to the frank are necessarily and almost entirely conjectural, there being no data to start from. I believe them wrong, and shall endeavor to show them so; and at the same time I acknowledge the activity and efficiency of the officer at the head of the Post-Office Department, his longer service and greater experience.

The expense of administering the new system is greater than the old. I present a statement so far as I have been able to obtain it, showing the cost of scales and the various other expenses incurred by the several Departments:

Interior	$2,269 00
State	64 77
Treasury	6,425 78
	8,759 55

The War, Navy, Post-Office, Executive, Justice, and Agricultural Departments make no reports, but it is safe to estimate it at $20,000, in all; which, together with the additional number of clerks required, about twenty, whose salaries will amount to $25,000, will make an item of expense of $45,000.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations says the cost of engraving and printing these official stamps is $8,000—a very low estimate I should say, but in the absence of definite knowledge I will call it that.

The salaries of postmasters are adjusted every two years, and are being adjusted now. They are adjusted, and the compensation is fixed upon the number of stamps canceled by him, and official stamps are used and counted in this cancellation. In many instances 40 per cent. and 50 per cent. of the total value of the stamps canceled are given to the postmaster as his salary. The total receipts of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1873, were $22,996,741.57; the compensation paid postmasters, not including clerk-hire or any other expense, $5,725,468; that is, 25 per cent. of the receipts of the Post-Office Department are paid out each year in the shape of compensation to postmasters. Two million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of these receipts are in the shape of official stamps. (See page 29, Report of Postmaster-General, 1873.) Twenty-five per cent. of $2,250,000 is $562,000. Here, then, is an increase of $560,000 in the salaries of postmasters, resulting entirely from the abolition of the franking privilege. This is nearly double the cost of the franking privilege itself, as shown by the report of the Postmaster-General, page 29, and equal to its cost, estimating full postage on all the documents printed by Congress, as shown by the official reports, and on twenty-five letters each day for each member.

On page 29 the Postmaster-General says that "the cost of free matter, if charged with the regular rates of postage, would amount to $2,543,327.72;" and then he says on the same page that the "net sales * * * of official stamps have been placed at $2,250,000." This leaves in round numbers $300,000 as the cost of the franking privilege by the Postmaster-General's own figures; for if you take the whole amount of free matter and deduct from it the official executive matter, it must leave the franked or legislative mail matter.

These estimates are further sustained by that part of the report of the Postmaster-General which treats of salaries. On pages 1 and 4, appendix, you will find estimate for postmasters' salaries for the year ending June 30, 1875, $6,500,000; estimate for postmasters' salaries for the year ending June 30, 1874, $5,525,000—showing an increase of $975,000 per annum as additional compensation to postmasters; $560,000 being the commission on the official stamps canceled, and $315,000 being the natural increase in salaries. All the figures then go to show that this official stamp increases the pay of the postmasters some $560,000 above their former pay, and this additional expense is justly chargeable to the abolition of the franking privilege.

Let us strike a balance, then, and see which system costs the most:

Cash receipts by the Post-Office Department in consequence of the abolition of the franking privilege	$100,000 00
Cash expenses:
Cost of scales, and clerks, &c.	$45,000 00
Cost of printing and engraving	8,000 00
Additional compensation to postmasters	560,000 00
Total cost	613,000 00

Leaving a balance of $500,000 in favor of the franking privilege, which will pay all the clerks in the folding-rooms and help pay for the printing of the public documents themselves.

The result is—exclusive of printing—that it costs $500,000 more now than it did to use the frank; and the people are deprived of documents which they formerly obtained free.

Mr. ATKINS obtained the floor, and yielded twenty minutes to Mr. COTTON.

Mr. COTTON. I send to the desk to be read an amendment which I desire to offer when in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

First. Strike out all of the first section after the enacting clause, and all of section 2, and insert:

That from and after the passage of this act postage shall be charged at the rate only of one cent for each two ounces, or fraction thereof, on all public documents, books, or publications, procured or published and issued by authority of Congress, or of either House thereof.

Second. Strike out section 4.

Mr. COTTON. The effect of this amendment will be to remove from the bill the partial restoration of the franking privilege, to reduce the postage on public documents one-half, and leave remaining in the bill section 3, which relates to the free circulation of newspaper exchanges and newspapers within the counties in which they are published. At present the postage on books is at the rate of one cent for every ounce, while on transient newspapers it is but one cent for two ounces. The amendment I propose will reduce postage on all documents in book form to one cent for each two ounces. This legislation is recommended by the Postmaster-General. In his report of last November, page 31, he says:

I further recommend that on all matter of the third class, the postage be made uniform at one cent for each two ounces, or fraction thereof. * * *

On books the postage will be reduced from two cents to one cent for each two ounces, or fraction thereof.

At the present time the postage on documents of ordinary size is from forty to fifty cents; on the Agricultural Report of 1869 the postage is forty cents; on that of 1870, thirty-eight cents; and on that of 1871, thirty-two cents; on the Educational Report of 1872, fifty-two cents; on the report of Hayden's Survey of 1872, forty-four cents. This will make the postage under this reduction, on ordinary documents, from twenty to twenty-five cents.

I think this is a better measure than restoring the franking privilege; and for this reduction I have the indorsement of the Postmaster-General—in fact as to all books. I may say here that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which we receive in newspaper form, can pass through the mails at the rate of one penny for two ounces; but when it is made into book form, you must pay for postage on it one penny per ounce—doubling the expense on the same printed matter.

There can be no objection, I think, to this reduction of postage; and I propose it as a substitute for the revival of the franking privilege. We have not been called upon to revive the franking privilege. We were certainly asked to abolish it; but we have not been requested to restore it, and for my own part I am not for volunteering to restore the right to frank. Reference has been made to the declaration of the national republican convention at Philadelphia in June, 1872, which in the tenth article of its platform declared—

The franking privilege ought to be abolished and the way prepared for a speedy reduction in the rates of postage.

Now, we have accomplished both of these objects. We have removed the frank and given cheap postage in the form of postal cards, by means of which a man can write a letter of pretty good length for a penny, and have the stationery furnished by the Government.

As regards the third section, while we have not been asked to restore the franking privilege, neither were we requested to make newspaper publishers pay postage on their exchanges or subscribers upon the newspapers of their own county. The Postmaster-General, in a letter written to the President of the Senate, on the 24th of January, 1874, says in regard to newspapers:

There is one restriction, however, which I never advised, and which, in my opinion, might be safely removed, and that is the provision which forbids the free transportation of weekly newspapers within the counties of their publication, as heretofore authorized by law. The grounds upon which this recommendation is made are, first, that such papers are so evenly distributed over the entire extent of the country and confined to lines of transit so short that they have never been known to impede the distribution and transportation of the mails; and secondly, that the amount of postage levied upon them, as at present collected, while affording but a trifling revenue to the Department, is yet heavy enough to be severely felt by their proprietors and patrons, and to obstruct the dissemination of local intelligence. Good reasons may also be given in favor of a free exchange between newspapers.

So we have the opinion of the Postmaster-General in favor of the free circulation of these papers. And I believe in following as far as I can the request of the officer who is in charge of the postal affairs of the nation.

In a letter to the Speaker of this House, written on the 20th of January last, the Postmaster-General does show that there has been some gain to the country by the abolition of the franking privilege. In that letter, he says:

It will be observed that, including postal cards, which are to be considered among the regular issues, the increase for the quarter ending September 30, 1873, over the same quarter of 1872, was $583,198, or 12.5 per cent. The average rate of increase for the corresponding quarters of the four preceding years was only 8.4 per cent.; so that 4.1 per cent., or $191,288.94, of the increase above mentioned may be fairly considered as due to the abolition of the franking privilege, and proper to be added to the other revenues accruing therefrom.

It is only just to believe that this increase would have been greater had it not been for the recent introduction of postal cards, which, serving to cheapen postages, and to decrease the amount of letter correspondence, could not fail to seriously diminish the revenue.

He also states in the letter to which I have referred, addressed to the President pro tempore of the Senate, that there has been a saving in the expense of carrying the mails. In that letter he says:

This act, [March 3, 1873,] it will be seen, fixes the rate on routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of two hundred pounds at fifty dollars per mile per annum, and allows twenty-five dollars additional for the next three hundred pounds, twenty-five dollars additional for each of the next three additions of five hundred pounds, twenty-five dollars additional for each of the next two additions of fifteen hundred pounds, and twenty-five dollars additional for every additional twenty hundred pounds. Under a call made by the Department, in obedience to the requirements of the act, the proprietors of railroad routes throughout the country are submitting returns of the weights of mails taken in the month of October, in the absence of all congressional publications, and the rates of compensation are being readjusted on the basis of these weights. Had not the transmission of such publications been discontinued in consequence of the abolition of the franking privilege, the rates awarded in the readjustment now being made would be higher in exact proportion to the increase in the weight of the mails which the transmission of this heavy matter would have caused, whatever that increase might be.

He is still objecting to any restoration of the frank. We have in this bill two propositions: one to restore the franking privilege on Government documents; and the other in relation to newspapers to subscribers in the county of their publication and newspaper exchanges. These two are coupled in this bill; but they were not connected in the bill abolishing the franking privilege. That bill was passed in January, 1873, while this provision to make newspaper exchanges subject to postage and to make county subscribers pay postage was attached to an appropriation bill in the Senate which finally passed March 3, 1873. It was accomplished in this way: the Post-Office appropriation bill passed the House, and while in the Senate and before the Committee on Appropriations, there was added, unasked by the Post-Office Department, or by the people, this provision:

Provided, That all laws and parts of laws permitting the transmission by mail of any free matter whatever be, and the same are hereby, repealed from and after June 30, 1873.

That is the provision which subjected these papers to the payment of postage; and it was ingrafted upon the Post-Office appropriation bill in the Senate, and was carried through the House in connection with that bill. We have two propositions in this bill, one to restore the frank on public documents, and the other for circulation of newspaper exchanges and papers to county subscribers. Members will bear in mind that they may be compelled to vote for or against both of these measures. If the previous question shall be demanded—and it no doubt will be by the gentleman who has charge of this bill—and it should be ordered, then gentlemen must vote for or against both of these measures. Therefore we should be careful and not order the previous question, but leave the bill open to such amendments as it may be desirable to offer. I believe it proper to reduce the rates on documents to at least as low a rate as that charged on transient newspapers, which is one cent on two ounces. I think if the portion of the bill restoring the frank shall not be adopted, members will be in favor of reducing the postage one-half of the present rate, when we are carrying out the request of the Postmaster-General. If the previous question is not ordered these two propositions may be divided, and gentlemen may vote as they please, either to restore the franking privilege or not, or to make newspapers free in their exchanges, and to their county subscribers or not.

Mr. ATKINS. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] for twenty minutes.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] when offering his amendment to this bill the other day, referred to the abolition of the franking privilege as having been demanded by the formal action of the republican party at the Philadelphia convention. And the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] in the brilliant speech which he made on the same day in support of his substitute, referred to the good faith with which the Senate and the House had acted upon the recommendation of the national republican convention.

I do not myself entirely agree as to the good faith with which the action of the Senate was taken, although I do agree that it was because of the action of the Philadelphia convention that we did succeed in taking the first step toward a repeal of the franking privilege. I therefore think it may not be unprofitable to recall the history of the legislation which ended in the abolition of the franking privilege.

In the Forty-first Congress a bill was reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads by the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Hill, for the naked abolition of the franking privilege. That bill passed the House on the 27th of January, 1870, by a vote of—yeas 124, nays 14. That was before the meeting of the Philadelphia convention. That bill went to the Senate, and was during that same session extensively debated there. The Senate rejected it, because, while it provided for the naked repeal of the franking privilege, it contained no provision and furnished no substitute for carrying the mail matter of the Government. Nobody who will review the debate in the Senate of that session will fail to realize, I think, that there was in that body a strong impression that the bill was an impracticable measure, a buncombe measure on the part of the House, not intended in good faith to get rid of the frank but to put the odium of retaining it upon the Senate. The Senate accordingly refused to agree to the bill as sent to them by the House, nor did they return it to the House with any amendments.

In the following Congress, immediately after the action of the Philadelphia convention adopting the resolution which has been last referred to by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COTTON] who has just taken his seat, Mr. Farnsworth, then chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, offered a bill, of which I hold a copy in my hand, which I had introduced at an earlier stage of the session, which had received the approval of that committee, and also the approval of the Post-Office Department, which bill provided for the abolition of the franking privilege, but provided also a method for carrying the mail matter of the Government. That was the bill which passed the House upon the 10th day of April, 1872, by a vote of 139 to 29. When that measure went to the Senate—a measure practicable in its character, providing for carrying the mail matter of the Government and for carrying it without the abuses and evils which it was alleged the frank had occasioned—the Senate, after debating it for some time, rejected all of it except the naked provision for the abolition of the franking privilege.

Having thus shorn the bill of all its practical parts, the Senate returned it to the House in the exact form of the bill from the House, which the Senate the session before had refused to adopt, thereby, in turn, putting the House in the position in which the Senate had been before put, of bearing the odium before the country of refusing to abolish the franking privilege. In thus tendering the House in return for the practical measure of legislation passed by the House the same impracticable measure which the House had the year before tendered to the Senate, and the Senate had then rejected, I see no evidence of good faith or of real desire by the Senate to get rid of the franking privilege. In this connection I ask the Clerk to read from the debate on the occasion of the passage by the Senate of their amendment to the bill to which I have referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BAYARD. I think it is pretty certain that an equal amount of humbuggery has never connected itself with any matter that ever came before Congress as is connected with this proposed abolition of the franking privilege. It has been a joke pretty much for the last hour in the Senate, perhaps a serious one for the people of the country; and in order that the Senate may take time to consider this matter a little more discreetly, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, that simple history of this legislation disposes, I think, of the assertion made by the gentlemen on the other side about the good faith manifested by the Senate in its action repealing the franking privilege, in answer to the resolution of the republican convention.

When this bill abolishing the frank came back to the House in this impracticable form, some conference took place among those gentlemen who were earnestly in favor of getting rid of the abuses growing out of the franking privilege, as to what should be done with it. It was finally determined to try and secure its adoption in its then shorn condition by the House, and to await further legislation to provide means for carrying the mail matter of the Government. Accordingly, on the 27th of January, 1873, Mr. Farnsworth called up the Senate amendment, with remarks, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

I propose now to ask the House to take the Senate at their word; adopt the amendment and pass the bill in accordance with the platforms of all political parties, and with what the House has professed its willingness to do so many times. Hereafter Congress may make such provision by supplementary legislation as may be deemed best for the transmission of official documents.

Mr. POTTER. This bill now under consideration is a proposition for the "supplementary legislation" which was then contemplated. It is a measure "for the transmission of official documents." For reasons which I will proceed briefly to state, I do not think it so good a measure as that which I originally proposed, and which passed the House in the Forty-second Congress, as I have explained.

In the first place, the present bill provides for an adhesive stamp or a stamped envelope for official matter, while that measure provided for machines to be prepared under the direction of the Post-Office Department, one of which should go to each Department of the Government, one to the Secretary of the Senate, and one to the Clerk of the House, which machines were to print or impress a proper mark or stamp upon all matter published by the Government, (including the Globe, or the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as it is now, and the speeches of members for their constituents.)

For instance, the Agricultural Report, when issued by the Agricultural Department, was, under this plan, to bear stamped upon it not only the name "Agricultural Report," but also a mark declaring that there was paid upon it forty-four cents, if that was then the postage, to the Government. The documents, to the extent of each member's quota, were to be delivered in that form to the members of Congress, so that a Representative would have had nothing to do but to address to his constituents any document furnished him by the Government; and it would have gone under that stamp through the mails without further stamping or payment. No frank was to be required; the Government was to furnish its public documents put up as now and already stamped in a manner which would carry them through the mail; an account of the postage could thus be kept, to be charged up to the proper Department issuing the document, and to be provided for out of its contingent fund. Thus the Postmaster-General would be enabled to keep his accounts, doing away with one great cause of complaint which he had against the franking privilege, while we would be enabled to ascertain exactly what the transmission of such class of public documents cost, and the Post-Office Department would get proper credit for what it carried; and there would be no possibility of abusing the frank by putting it upon any description of matter that ought not to go under it, or by forging it or otherwise subjecting it to improper uses.

Now, the plan of the committee under consideration I do not think so good as this plan of mine.

First, because it provides for an adhesive stamp or stamped envelope. These are apt to be wasted, and used for other purposes than official documents. In many States where the postage of members of the Legislature is paid by State authority, I understand that every little shop in the capital has for sale adhesive stamps and stamped envelopes obtained from members or employés of the Legislature; and I think it a very serious objection to any plan of carrying the mail matter of the Government that it does not provide for a simple mechanical appliance to do that work, which can be in that way better done than by members themselves, while at the same time it prevents the possibility of abuse by the stamp getting into improper hands, or by being used to transmit anything except the mail matter of the Government.

The second objection to this plan of the committee, as compared with that which I formerly proposed and which was adopted by the Forty-second Congress, is, as I understand it, that in addition to the adhesive stamp it requires the individual frank of the member of Congress upon each document he sends. Now, I am utterly at a loss to conceive why a member, having, we will suppose, a thousand Agricultural Reports to be sent free by the Government, should be required to write his name on every one of them. If he has a fancy for writing his name and looking at it, he can do so without authority of law; but I am unable to understand why he should be compelled to write his autograph upon each book, when he could just as well write a single order for a thousand books, to be furnished to him stamped and in a condition to go through the mails. More than that, if a member desires, as he properly may, to have the person receiving the document know who sent it, by sending down to the folding-room he can get label slips with his name printed upon them and paste them on these books with much less trouble and in a more legible form than is here provided for writing by the member of his own autograph upon every book.

Mr. PACKER. If a member were to write on these slips and paste them upon these books under the law as it now stands he would have to pay letter postage.

Mr. POTTER. True; and so he would if he wrote his name. But the question we are now considering is of changing the law; and when we are changing it, why frame it in an impracticable and troublesome way?

Now, sir, I believe, in the third place, the former plan was an advantage over this, because it provided for carrying, at the expense of the Government, the speeches of members and the reports of the congressional proceedings as well as the reports of Departments. I think, of all the public documents which go through the mails, that which is the least charge on the mails, either in bulk or difficulty of transportation, is the report of the speeches of members. I am not one of those gentlemen who hold that a Saturday is wasted when spent in debate. During the four years and more I have been in Congress I have never made a Saturday speech. Indeed, I never made a set speech, an hour's speech, since I have been in this House. Nevertheless, I do believe few days are better spent by the House of Representatives than are these Saturdays spent in debate: first, because we thus get rid of much of that general discussion which, if we did not have it on Saturday by itself, would take place during the course of the current business of the House; and secondly, because, as a most distinguished editor said to me the other day upon this floor, the Congress is not in close enough relations with the country, and what is wanted is that the people should know more of the views of their Representatives, not less.

It is now, I submit, impossible for any man, however intelligent, by following the reports of the House as given by the Associated Press, to get any good idea of the views and reasoning that lead to the action of Congress. One man only is permitted to have access to the floor. He is obliged at the same time to write out his reports. He is required also to condense within a small space an hour's argument, for instance, of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. Now, nobody can well condense a speech until it is finished, and the reporter of the Associated Press is often required to condense into ten lines of print what the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads may say on this or any other subject in a whole hour, and do it while the gentleman is speaking, not afterward. It is always a difficult task for any man to condense a long speech into a short report, yet the reporter of the Associated Press is required not only to do this, but to condense while the debate is going on. Beyond this, when he sends his report to the papers at home, it is cut and abridged in every possible form to meet the night editor's notions or space.

What is the result? I appeal to every member's experience if the sensational part of a debate is not that chiefly retained? Let a man be guilty of some extravagance; let him be guilty of any impropriety; let him say to anybody on the floor something that ought not to be said; let him be guilty of some sensationalism, and I appeal to every gentleman within the sound of my voice whether the language is not next morning reproduced in every newspaper. But let a Representative make an hour's speech on a subject he has studied and understands, and when you come to look at the report next day, what will you find? You will find that Mr. Jones spoke on this side or that side of the proposition; you will find, perhaps, the first sentence of his speech and the last sentence, but not any such report as will possess you of his argument. This is not the fault of the reporter; it is the inevitable result of the circumstances and nature of the case.

The country will not have condensed reports of the arguments as well as the action of the House. It does not want them. The newspapers would not find room for them if they were furnished. So that the only way by which a member of the House can ordinarily possess his constituents with his views is mainly through these Saturday speeches. I have kept, ever since I have been a member here, copies of all these speeches, so far as members have been good enough to send them to me, and I say, never having made one myself, that if any man shall sit down, and look over such a file of the speeches of any one session made on Saturdays, he will not have ground for a bad estimate of the thoughtfulness, intelligence, and capacity of the gentlemen composing the House of Representatives of the United States. I, therefore, in any scheme to retain the free circulation of documents, would especially retain the free circulation of the speeches members might make on the floor at any time; and in this respect I also regard the substitute for the franking privilege I introduced into the Forty-second Congress as superior to that now proposed by the Post-Office Committee.

Mr. Speaker, I do not offer as a substitute for the plan of the committee this plan of mine to which I have adverted, because the circumstances are now different. So long as the abuse of the franking privilege continued, it seemed to me the duty of a legislator to get rid of it by substituting some plan for carrying the official correspondence and publications of the Government, which was not open to the same abuses; not to insist on a plan which would put an end to the printing for general circulation of public documents, but to leave that matter to be considered by itself afterward. Therefore I sought for a law which would send the mail matter of the Government through the mails free, as it was then, and which would at the same time send it without any of those abuses which have been referred to, such as forging the frank, the sending of improper matter, and the like, which attended the franking privilege; and send it in a way which would enable the Postmaster-General to keep his accounts, so that he could collect the postage on the matter issued by each Department of the Government, and get in his Department proper credit for the service it did.

But since the law repealing the franking privilege passed in the impracticable shape in which it did, abolishing the frank and providing no substitute for it, I am constrained to look at the subject in a different light from that in which I looked at it then, and to consider now whether it is worth while to continue the free publication of public documents for general distribution at all. On the whole, and after mature reflection, I am rather inclined to think it is not.

The documents which Congress publishes in considerable number are mainly two—the abridged edition of the Message, with accompanying documents, and the Agricultural Report. As regards the other public documents, of which a few copies only are issued—such, for instance, as the Report of the Coast Survey, or the Report on the Solar Eclipse—I think every gentleman who cares for a proper distribution of the documents intrusted to him tries to keep reports of that kind for those who need them specially and send for them, or for some institution of education or learning, and who would be as well served if they could buy them for the cost of printing But as regards the great mass of documents, and especially the Agricultural Reports and the abridged Message and documents, what is the unavoidable result as to the system of distribution proposed to be continued?

Mr. ATKINS. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. POTTER. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Tennessee for his courtesy.

In the first place, is it not true that such documents are distributed among the people unequally? This is the necessary consequence of having them distributed by favor. If you get a thousand copies of a book, you will not have more than one to each man in twenty-five; or, assuming one hundred and thirty thousand as the number of people in a district, these books reach one in every one hundred and thirty of the population. They therefore have necessarily to be distributed unequally, and that is, as the gentleman from Vermont says, unfairly. Then, in the next place, it is unavoidable that these books do not reach those of the people who most want them. And, in the third place, what seems to me most important in this connection is, that you never get sets of successive volumes of the same books in the same hands. One member of Congress sends one or two volumes of a certain report to one constituent, and his successor sends the succeeding volumes of the same report to another constituent. I am told that one can hardly find a complete set of the Smithsonian Reports anywhere in the United States; and that complete sets of the other more common reports are rare.

These evils are unavoidable. They belong to the free circulation of public documents. And therefore, since the question now is whether we shall provide for their free circulation in the mails or cease to publish them, I am inclined to think it would be better for the people—and that is what we have to consider—and I think equally well for us (for I do not think this distribution of public documents is of great service to a public man personally) to cease to publish them as is now done, and that instead the Government should sell the public documents at the actual cost of printing and paper to every man who wants them. I do not understand that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] does this in his bill. I understand from the debate that he puts the price below the actual cost of printing and paper. I think that the actual cost should be the measure of the price, and that these documents should be for sale on those terms.

The House will recollect that what has been done by Great Britain has been referred to. Now, although Great Britain is an aristocratic country, its example in matters of business may sometimes be an example not amiss to consider. And however unfortunate the British people may be in the nature of their government, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] said, I do not think that is a reason why, when they have tried an experiment of a practical nature like this and found it to fail, we should shut our eyes to their experience. Now it is a fact that they have been through this whole business of franking and free documents and have given it up. They have gone through with the use both of the frank by members of Parliament and of having public documents for free distribution, and have adopted instead the system of abolishing the frank and of having the government furnish public documents, to those who want those documents, at their actual cost.

Therefore, since I have no further time to discuss this subject, I will merely add that I shall first favor the substitute of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and then, if that fails, the amendment introduced by yourself, Mr. Speaker, [Mr. MONROE in the chair,] which is intended to confine the distribution and publication of public documents to those already printed.

Mr. ATKINS. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HERNDON.]

Mr. HERNDON. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BUTLER,] to allow the reference of a bill.

CHOCTAW INDIANS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2189) to provide for the payment of the award made by the Senate of the United States in favor of the Choctaw Indians, on the 9th day of March, 1859; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MEMORIAL CONCERNING INTER-STATE COMMERCE.

Mr. McCRARY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and referred under the law to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of Hubbard's memorial concerning commerce by railroads among the several States, being House Miscellaneous Document No. 140, be printed for the use of the House.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 825) in relation to the distribution of public documents, &c.

Mr. HERNDON. When this or a similar measure was before the House last year I opposed it, because I thought it unwise and injurious. And for the same reason that I opposed it then, I oppose the measure now before the House. I oppose it because it is not wide enough in its scope. It does not go far enough; it does not go so far as the measure which was repealed.

This debate, so far as it has demonstrated anything, has shown this: that from no quarter of this House is confidence fully given to the recommendation of the Postmaster-General on this question. He has not only shown by his own report and by his figures that this is not the panacea for these wrongs of which he complains, and that it has not benefited the country, but he has shown that it has caused an actual loss so far to the Treasury of the country.

As was shown by a gentleman who addressed the House the other day, by the figures given by the Postmaster-General in his own estimates for this fiscal year, there will be required $1,623,159.90 more of deficiency than was required last year. When the Postmaster-General stated that if the franking privilege was abolished there would be no necessity hereafter for any deficiency appropriation for his Department, he stated what his own figures show now was incorrect; for there is a large deficiency, and there must necessarily be.

He made his estimate upon the hypothesis that if the franking privilege was abolished there would be sent through the mail equally as much matter, both written and printed, upon which postage would be paid, as had been previously sent through free of postage. Now this was a false basis upon which to make his estimates; false for many reasons. The members of this House, and of the other branch of Congress, who had heretofore sent printed matter through the mail, would no longer send it when the franking privilege was cut off and they had to pay the postage upon it, because they could not do it out of their own means with their then salaries. It has been shown that for the Forty-second Congress it would have required an average of $976.50 for each member to pay the postage upon the printed matter sent off by that Congress. That was more than any member, with the salary he was then receiving, was able to pay. Therefore it has not been done, nor will it be done. And it is a fact that at this time the books that have been printed since the franking privilege was abolished are all, or nearly all, of them in the folding-room, waiting until we shall pass some law by which they can be sent free of postage through the mail.

It has been said by some that these documents are of no value to the people; that they are not and will not be read by them. I beg to assure gentlemen on this floor that I can say for my constituency that that statement is not correct. They not only ask for all the documents that are printed, for all the documents that are sent off by each member as his pro rata share, but, as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] said, hundreds of letters are received by members asking for more printed matter, for reports of committees, for executive documents, agricultural reports, and every character of document printed here. The demand is greatly in excess of the supply.

Mr. ATKINS. I yield to the gentleman for three minutes longer.

Mr. HERNDON. Another reason is that there is no saving to the Government if stamps are provided at the public expense for putting on these documents, because the cost of producing those stamps is just that much loss to the Government. It would be like taking money out of one pocket and putting it in the other. The Government gains nothing by it, and loses simply the expense of producing the stamps. And, as a friend near me suggests, that would be more in amount than all frauds practiced under the old system. And, as has been shown here to-day by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. STOWELL,] when matter is sent through the mail and paid by means of postage-stamps, the salaries of postmasters throughout the country are thereby increased. And in that respect alone—of increase of salaries—the expense to the country is more than the abuse complained of.

And the abuse under the old system, so much complained of, was in reality an advantage to the country. Under that abuse all species of information was sent through the mails. For, as shown by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] who has just preceded me, one class of matter—speeches—which was sent through the mails, was above all other matter a benefit to the country. That very abuse was no abuse at all, but a great benefit to the people. And so far as my experience goes, I believe it has produced greater advantages to the country than any other class of matter sent out through the mails. I only regret that more speeches are not sent out than have been heretofore. My experience has been this: I have not only sent out great numbers of all the speeches I made myself, but I procured thousands of copies of those made by other gentlemen in this House, and sent them to my constituents, and I have the assurance from hundreds of the best citizens in my district that I could not send too many of them, for they were sought for and sent around the neighborhood, and read with the greatest avidity.

Knowledge is power, and every means which we in this House can use to increase the knowledge of the country, by sending out public documents and speeches and every character of matter that conveys sound information to the country, is of vast benefit to the people. If this Government depends upon the virtue and intelligence of the people, why not increase the means of information? Why not enable the people by these means, or by any other, if you please, to keep up with their Representatives in this House and to fully understand every measure that is before it for consideration? I believe this is the cheapest mode, and I believe it has heretofore resulted in the greatest benefit to the country—greater than from any other measure that can be passed by this Congress. Therefore I favor the revival of the old law as it was before it was repealed.

Mr. ATKINS. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] for five minutes.

Mr. BUCKNER. If I can get an opportunity to do so, I propose to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in lines 3, 4, 5, and 6, of the first section, the words "all public documents, books, or publications, and all printed matter procured or published and issued by authority of Congress;" and insert in lieu "all printed reports, speeches, and proceedings made or had in Congress, and public documents, books, publications, or other printed matter published and issued from the Government Printing Office or by authority of Congress;" also add to the section "for forty days after the adjournment of each session of Congress."

Mr. SPEER. I ask that all the amendments which members have sent to the Clerk's desk be ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, the first object I would seek to accomplish by this amendment (if I had an opportunity to offer it) is to divest entirely the franking privilege of what I conceive to be the great abuse of which the people have complained; and that is, making it, as it were, a personal perquisite of members of Congress. So far as the mere distribution of public documents is concerned, I hold that the bill of the committee does not go far enough. So far as it pretends to give the people information—and information which they ought to have of whatever is done in Congress, whether in the form of reports, speeches, or in other ways—I hold that the provisions of the bill, notwithstanding the opinion of my friend, the chairman of the committee, do not go far enough to accomplish the object which I believe he has at heart. Let me illustrate. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] delivered here the other day a speech upon the finances which ought to be in the hands of every man in this country who takes an interest in the financial condition of the Government. Now, I say that under this bill that speech, or any report of a similiar character that is put before this House, cannot, except as a part of our proceedings, be sent abroad except at the individual expense of members themselves. I might further illustrate my views on this subject by referring to the speech of the distinguished chairman of the committee that has charge of this bill, [Mr. PACKER,] and the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.] Both those speeches contained important information, which the country ought to have in order to pass properly and fairly upon the question now under consideration; yet I undertake to say that by no sort of construction of the provisions of this bill could those speeches pass through the mails free; they must be obtained by the people by means of contributions from the pockets of members. So far as I am concerned, I am very willing to put my hand in my pocket and pay for such copies of those speeches as I may desire to circulate; but I think it only right that they should go through the mails free. Hence the provision which I desire to insert, that not only what may, strictly speaking, be published and issued by authority of Congress or either House, but also reports, speeches, or any proceedings that take place in this House, shall be sent free through the mails.

I come now to refer to the other point. What was the great abuse which the country had a right to complain of, and did complain of under the old system? It was that the franks of members of Congress were used not only for their official business, but for the individual advantage of the member himself. The franks were even forged; and they were used for electioneering and partisan purposes. Thus the mails of the country were filled with matter that ought not to have been carried at public expense. This was the great abuse. Now, sir, the object of the two provisions I have introduced is, in the first place, to provide that this privilege shall be exercised by the member only during the session and for a limited time thereafter; and, in the second place, to cut off what has been in the past a very great abuse, of which the people had a right to complain.

Mr. ATKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS.]

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire but a minute or two to explain the reasons of the vote I am going to give upon this question. At the meeting of the fall courts in my district, I took the precaution to consult the people in every county and every court-house upon this question. They were assembled numerously everywhere; and I spoke to them without regard to party. I asked them how I should vote upon this question; I asked them to give me their instructions upon this subject. I called upon those in favor of restoring the franking privilege to say "ay," and those of the contrary opinion "no;" and in the eleven counties which I represent not one solitary man voted in the negative. Men of all parties voted for the restoration of the franking privilege. Not only did they vote for it, but they cried out clamorously, "Give us light; give us information from headquarters; we need to know what is going on at the seat of Government; now, above all other times, we want to know what the Government is doing; we want to be in immediate communication with our public servants. Restore the franking privilege; give us documents; give us speeches; give us books; give us everything."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote for the nearest approach I can get to the pure restoration of the franking privilege. I am very willing to see some restrictions thrown around it to prevent the abuses complained of by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.] But I shall vote to restore the franking privilege; and I am glad to say that as a democrat, believing in being instructed by the people and in obeying the people whose servant I am, I vote their sentiments.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 42) granting a pension to Caleb A. Lamb, late a musician in Company E, of the Forty-sixth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry;

An act (S. No. 217) granting a pension to Julia A. Smith;

An act (S. No. 387) granting a pension to Captain Benjamin Farley, of Company C, Fifth Indiana Cavalry; and

An act (S. No. 395) for the relief of Edward H. Calvert.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 1225) granting a pension to William E. Prince, of Iowa; and

An act (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians.

TRANSMISSION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to occupy time in the discussion of this bill. I will merely state that I shall record my vote against it, though if the proposition were divided I should vote for the third section, which provides for the free transmission of newspapers within the county in which they are published and for free newspaper exchanges.

Mr. PLATT, of New York, obtained the floor, and yielded fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HAZELTON.]

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, when I voted to make this bill the special order for the 12th instant I intended to indicate, as other gentlemen did, an intention to support the measure when it should be brought in. Had I been in doubt in regard to it, that doubt would have been removed by the arguments and statistics already presented to the House, which I think have clearly demonstrated both its wisdom and economy. If these figures prove anything they prove that the measure can be carried out without adding a dollar to the contracts for carrying the mails.

This, Mr. Speaker, is not a restoration of the franking privilege. It is simply a method for distributing the public documents of the Government among the people to whom they belong—perhaps not the best method, but a method, and one that seems to me as efficient as any I have heard suggested for the object contemplated.

It is not for the benefit of the members of Congress; on the contrary, its passage entails a vast additional labor upon them. The proposition is simply to employ the mails for distributing certain printed matter, seeds, &c., among the people.

I cannot, Mr. Speaker, go at length into the discussion of this subject in the few minutes allotted me, nor is it necessary.

Some years ago the republican party established a Bureau of Agriculture at the capital of the nation, and has maintained it against strong opposition ever since. It was designed to gather up valuable information from all parts of the world touching the practical wants and interests and methods of agriculture; but it had also another object. It was intended that this Bureau should be deemed, as it is in fact, a national recognition of the importance, value, and dignity of agriculture as a great and leading interest of the American people.

This Bureau has been in successful operation for years. It has been during all this time in constant correspondence with practical and scientific gentlemen, and with the various agricultural societies and organizations throughout this country and Europe, and has gathered up a vast fund of scientific, practical, and statistical information, which from time to time has been published under the authority of Congress and distributed far and wide. It has also been an agent of the people for the exchange of seeds and roots between this and other countries, and the distribution of the same here, and also for conducting a great variety of experiments and investigations in the direct and immediate interest of soil products. It has been constantly employed in ascertaining and disseminating information of great value to one of the most prominent interests of the people. Letters are invited, and are constantly being received, from interested parties, calling for information which could not without much difficulty and expense be obtained elsewhere. There is no gentleman on this floor who represents an agricultural community, in whole or in part, who is not daily receiving demands for the published reports of this Bureau.

The simple question is, shall this Bureau be abolished and the only recognition which this great nation gives to one of its most important industries—that of agriculture—be swept away? Because it is useless to attempt to conceal the fact that the proposition to abolish this Bureau stands right behind the opposition to this bill. The refusal to disseminate these reports is but the preliminary step to refusing to publish them, and refusing to publish means the abolition of the Bureau itself.

In my judgment nothing could be more unwise, untimely, and uncalled for than the blow aimed at this great and invaluable industry of the nation, in the attempt to strike down its only recognized department in the Government. It comes, sir, not only at the wrong time, but it comes in the spirit of a false economy and a pernicious philosophy. The inconsiderable sum expended for this department is money well expended, and in the end comes back with interest in improved methods of farming and in the aggregate productiveness of the nation. It comes right when the demands for it throughout one-half of the Union, where a change in the whole economy of agricultural pursuits has been necessitated, are stronger than ever. If other gentlemen covet the task of striking down this department just at this juncture, they are welcome to the glory and the rewards. I have no ambition in that direction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what I have said in regard to this class of reports applies with more or less force to others, and specially the census reports and the messages and accompanying documents. These are invaluable. Let me speak now of the former. So long as this Government proposes to discharge the functions of a government, it must from time to time prepare a census of its growth and resources. All or nearly all the governments of the earth do this to a certain extent.

Now, sir, if the information thus obtained cannot be freely disseminated among the people the work is shorn of its greatest value. In fact this information is procured for the people by their own agents. They have a right to demand it without being dependent on metropolitan newspapers or any intermediate agency for it.

Suppose it does cost something to circulate the reports, shall we decline to take the census because it will cost something to distribute it among the people? For whom is the information gathered up if not for them?

It is no argument to say that if the law provides for distributing documents too many will be printed. It is the business of Congress to see that too many are not printed. There is no difficulty in making the limitation. I will go as far as any man to cut off worthless publications, but I can find no reason in the fear that our duty will be neglected for disregarding the just claims of another.

Nor do I see much force in the claim that the Government ought not to publish any reports because it cannot publish enough to give every citizen one. If this argument is worth anything, it would preclude the publishing of all reports, and render the people of the country dependent on irresponsible, inaccurate, and conflicting newspaper reports for all information concerning the different departments of the Government. You might as well abolish the mails because one-half of the people never use them, or because some use them much more than others.

Besides, sir, it must be remembered that the contents of a book are not confined to the party who receives it. The Agricultural Reports, for instance, pass from hand to hand. They are read and discussed at club meetings; they are deposited in neighborhood and school-district libraries, and their contents spread broadcast throughout the farming sections of the country.

Mr. Speaker, another proposition has been made to which I wish to advert for a moment. It is that the Government sell the reports to those who want to buy them for cost. I cannot assent to such a proposition. I see no reason why this Government should resolve itself into a book agency of the Cheap-John order, and sell the reports of its different Bureaus and Departments to the people. I cannot agree to that. If these reports are called for at all, it is because they are of value and interest to the people. There is no other view upon which you can justify their publication for a moment. Certainly not for the gratification of the heads of these Bureaus and Departments, whose rights do not seem to me to be higher than those of the people or their representatives.

If you are to continue the publication of the messages and accompanying documents, the census reports, and the agricultural reports, you must do so because, and only because, the people of the country are interested in them, and because their promulgation is a matter of public concern.

The moment you determine that they are not published on this ground, and that you will interpose a condition on which the people may procure them; in other words, that they are not for the people but for those who can pay for them, you establish a totally new theory for the printing of documents.

I do not want to see the Government put itself in the attitude of saying to the parties who apply for these reports, "Gentlemen, these reports cost fifty or sixty cents per volume, and you can have them at that price." It looks to me like a two-penny business for a great Government like ours. It involves a wrong principle, and ought not to be indorsed. I would much rather vote to abolish the printing altogether.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, has another important provision which I heartily approve. It provides for the free circulation of newspapers in the counties where published and a free exchange list. This is but the restoration of a law which ought never to have been repealed, and seems to me eminently wise and proper.

Regarding this measure as on the whole a judicious one, I shall very cordially do what I can for its passage.

Mr. PLATT, of New York. I will now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] to offer an amendment, in order that it may be printed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I give notice I shall offer the following amendment when in order; and I now ask that it be read, and ordered to be printed.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 3, line 6, strike out the word "weekly" and insert the words "all other;" so it will read, "all other newspapers."

Mr. MAYNARD. Is that amendment offered to be voted on now?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I give notice I will offer it when in order. I now ask that it be ordered to be printed.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads what time it is proposed to call the previous question on this bill? We have had a long debate upon what seemed to be already well understood when we entered upon it.

Mr. PLATT, of New York. I did not yield to the gentleman from Tennessee; but will now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPRAGUE] to introduce a bill.

WAR OF 1812.

Mr. SPRAGUE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2190) to amend the act entitled "An act to grant pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and to widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, to restore to the pension-roll those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

TRANSMISSION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads at what time he proposes to call the previous question? I do not propose to take any part in the debate myself.

Mr. PACKER. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] will allow me, I will say, in response to the gentleman's question, that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads wish to call the previous question early to-morrow morning. Quite a number of gentlemen about me desire to speak to-day on this bill. The committee do not wish to cut off any gentleman from being heard. We have thought that by to-morrow morning all the gentlemen who wish to speak will have an opportunity to express their views on this bill; and as soon as the bill is reached to-morrow the previous question will be demanded.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the gentleman propose to take an hour for debate after the previous question is demanded?

Mr. PACKER. That will give an hour to close the debate under the rule.

Mr. MAYNARD. This will then take up all day to-morrow.

Mr. PACKER. It will come up in regular order at half-past one, and if the previous question be then seconded and the main question ordered, we can come to a vote, I think, about half-past two o'clock.

Mr. PLATT, of New York. I yield now thirty minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS.]

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, I shall oppose the bill introduced by the committee. I shall oppose the amendment suggested in his speech by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. TYNER;] I shall oppose the substitute which will be offered at the proper time by my friend from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] In a word, I shall oppose, with all due respect to those who differ from me in opinion, every bill, every amendment, every substitute, which proposes in whole or in part, directly or indirectly, to re-enact the franking privilege. I believe that a privilege for the few is an injustice to the many, and I for one shall try to give privileges to none, equal rights to all.

My opposition to this bill in the first instance, Mr. Speaker, is on the ground of that economy which we praise so much, which we practice so little. [Laughter.] And if it is not presumptuous to criticise, let me say that in my opinion the record of this House in that regard has been singularly illogical and unsatisfactory; and when I remember that we are what my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] so appropriately called us a few days ago in a moment of great excitement; when I remember that in his words we are a "body of intelligent statesmen," I submit, Mr. Speaker, our record is puzzling and unsatisfactory. [Laughter.]

What is that record? We came here fresh from the people, eager to win reputation for ourselves, and to save the Commonwealth. What did we do? We began to speak; you spoke, Mr. Speaker; I spoke; and every man who got the floor spoke—for what? To demonstrate to the people our willingness to sacrifice even our own salaries. [Laughter.] We wasted ten days in talk, and when an end came, when we were all tired, when we were all hungry, when we were all sleepy, my indefatigable friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] insisted we should stay here late into the evening that he might read us a lecture on the selfish extravagance which would cut down our salaries to only $6,000 instead of $5,500, [laughter]—a sum which he had recommended and more than once urged us to adopt. And the father of the House, [Mr. DAWES,] rising to the height of the great subject, in a voice whose sepulchral warning yet lingers in my ear, assured us again and again that he could bide his time—he could bide his time.

I went home that night distressed that I could not look upon this matter of $500 as one of such stupendous importance. But, sir, at the same time it entered my heart to think that under leaders so zealous the Republic could never take any detriment. But, mark you, the very next morning, or the next morning but one, my friend upon my right, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DONNAN,] the chairman of the Committee on Printing, modestly stepped to the front, and in this same House and before the same earnest economists proposed a bill—for what? To print for gratuitous distribution two hundred and fifty thousand copies of the Agricultural Report; not two hundred and fifty; not twenty-five hundred; not twenty-five thousand; but two hundred and fifty thousand copies, of the Agricultural Report. How I admired the audacity of my friend from Iowa! How I pitied his fate! If there had been such protests and speeches for a poor $500, what would be the fate of a man who dared to come before this House and propose that we should throw $500,000 into the rag-bags and barber-shops of the nation?

Mr. Speaker, my indefatigable friend from Maine never once took the floor upon that question; the father of the House refused utterly to prophesy, and the bill of my friend from Iowa went through almost without objection, certainly without discussion. And then day after day followed, and bill after bill was introduced, and the session began to grow old. Was there a man of us who got the floor who did not cry out for economy? Was there a man of us able to find that particular measure on which he was willing to practice it? [Laughter.]

By and by there came an occasion, and the brave and eloquent gentleman before me [Mr. WOODFORD] seized it. He offered the House an opportunity to reform and improve its record. He rose up very boldly—very unfortunately as the issue showed—and clearly placed the issue before the House. Does the House wish to discuss the finances of the nation, or does it wish to discuss its garden-seeds? And after full consideration the House, by one of the most unanimous votes I have witnessed this session, declared that as for them they would provide first for the distribution of garden-seeds, and after that for the distribution of the currency. [Laughter.] When I sought the explanation of this seemingly inexplicable decision, what was it? The reply which I never hear upon this floor, but which I hear in my seat or whispered in the lobby, "It was the grangers;" that the grangers had called the attention of their Representatives to the fact that spring had come and the earth was waiting for its seeds, and there could be no further delay. [Laughter.]

And so we get a bill before us which I say, in perfect sincerity, revives the franking privilege. I say it explicitly and boldly, this bill of the committee gives the member every right he had before except one. We cannot write our autograph letters and frank them. Wonderful restriction! We may frank documents that weigh one hundred pounds; we cannot frank a half-ounce letter. The gentlemen of the committee take from us the only privilege that is desirable and not subject to abuse. Who will write letters enough to burden the mails? Does the committee know how hard it is for members to write? Does it know how hard it is for constituents to read? The abuse lies elsewhere.

What was the abuse of the franking privilege which was complained of? Was it not the free transmission of heavy material, masses of binding and printing which we crammed into the mails of the country, to the damage and delay of the business and social correspondence of the people? And it is this heavy material that the bill proposes to frank—public documents, books, periodicals, seeds, roots, plants, scions, everything else that is worthless and heavy. The committee in preparing this bill have revived the old abuse. They have taken the poor old castaway of the Forty-second Congress; they have given him a silk hat, and have dyed his mustache. But he is the same old original Jacobs still. [Laughter.]

Why not be fair; why not be frank; and come out and say, "Behold the old bill; we have rebaptized it; but only—

> Keep the word of promise to our ear,
> And break it to our hope!"

I think it was my friend from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] who said that the abuse of the franking privilege was that members of this House and members of the Senate used it dishonestly. Mr. Speaker, judging others by myself, no one can think more poorly of this House than I, and yet I am perfectly convinced that neither in this House nor in the other is there to be found men who would dishonestly use a privilege like this. The statement is false on the face of it. Am I to believe with my friend from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER] that any of these members now gathering round me—members who represent intelligent constituencies—any in this "collection of intelligent statesmen" would use his frank to send his dirty linen home to the wash? [Laughter.] Sir, the idea is preposterous. A member who would use his frank to send his soiled linen to his washerwoman would never have any. [Renewed laughter.] And if there is any one who supposes that any Senator at the other end of the Capitol is about to frank home his furniture, when the people have no longer need of his services here, he must suppose that Senator a blockhead. No; the only abuse of the franking privilege is that which we propose to revive; that is, to load the mail with a mass of heavy material which does not pay its way.

What is urged in favor of this proposition? We are told that it is our bounden duty—my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] puts it the shortest—to provide the people with information. Now I will admit that my friend needs information; I think the people need information. But the people need other things—many more than we can supply. The people need warmth, cleanliness, virtue. But no one here comes forward and proposes a free distribution of fires, of baths, or of Bibles. [Laughter.]

The people need something else. And just here for once the sentiments of him who dwelleth in cities and him who dwelleth on the prairies, of him who lives in the East, and of him who lives in the West, of him who lives in the North, and of him who lives in the South, agree. Here is the one great want of the country. Why, Mr. Speaker, [Mr. MONROE in the chair,] did you ever meet one of your friends who was from the noble West who did not tell you that the noble West needed money? [Laughter.] Did you ever meet any one from the sunny South who did not tell you that the sunny South needed money? And I am willing frankly to confess, in the presence of this "collection of intelligent statesmen," that my own State of New Jersey needs money. More; I have the best of evidence, to come nearer home, that in my own district there is scarcely a man, woman, or child who does not need money. And yet I do not propose, nor do you propose, neither does this committee propose, to distribute to your people or to my people the free bath, or the free fire, or the free Bible, or the free greenback. [Laughter.]

Now, my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] who addressed you three or four days ago, with an eloquence that was untutored but very effective, whose imagination flashed along the iron net-work of his logic in a way that fairly astonished the House, spoke of a great many things that filled me with wonder and amazement. He spoke of the hay-seed in his hair, [laughter,] and under the magic touch of his voice that hay-seed glowed around his head like the halo of the martyrs, [continued laughter;] and when he spoke of the oats in his throat, it was with such a force and such eloquence that I knew he felt them, [loud laughter;] and to all of this I had not the slightest objection. I listened and wondered; I gazed and admired until he came to praise his country folk at the expense of mine. This I would not stand. He represents a country constituency, just as I do. He has no large cities in his district, just as I have none. And he had no business to boast of the intelligence of his farmers on the prairies, just as if there were no intelligent farmers in New Jersey. [Laughter.] How he boasted of their literary taste! And when he began to tell us all that his farmers sent him letters to ask for books, I wanted then and there to rise up and say, "I represent farmers; they write to me for books; day after day I get similar letters from my constituents. They are wonderful letters, and sometimes the energy of their petition is such that it defies Noah Webster and Lindley Murray. They never fail to make the proviso that I should pay the postage." [Laughter.]

Sir, I do not believe that among the letters from his prairie constituents, of which he speaks so bravely, he can find one that asks him for the history of the silurian period, or the crustaceous formation, or the isothermal theory. It takes the Jersey farmer to ask for such! I appeal to the House, shall he boast over the intelligent requests of his farmers because they live on the prairies, and I be tongue-tied here and not suffered to speak of the intelligence of my farmers who live on the banks of the Passaic, the Hackensack, and the Hudson? [Renewed laughter.]

But, Mr. Speaker, I have concealed part of the truth. For every letter which I receive asking for the silurian period, or the crustaceous formation, or the isothermal theory, I receive two letters which prefer a different request. For every letter asking for a public document, a Patent-Office Report, or even an Agricultural Report, I get a letter politely and kindly asking the loan of five dollars. [Laughter.] Now, I ask if we are to furnish all our constituents with all they want—with their heat, with their information, with their cleanliness, with their virtue—must we not also furnish them with money? Yet I do not hear one single member, even if he represents a grange, who stands upon this floor to ask that, in addition to the Agricultural Report and the isothermal theory, we shall also by free distribution send five dollars to each of our constituents. And yet would not the five dollars help more than the Agricultural Report in our elections next fall?

But my friend from Illinois is confident that the people at large want these documents. Now, Mr. Speaker, far be it from me to run against the people. I have great respect for them in view of the fact that an election occurs so soon. But let us be sure first as to what the people want. My friend from Illinois himself aided to show that the people do not want the franking privilege and do not want the public documents at the cost of taxation. He very properly ruled out from the discussion all the disreputable members of the community. He said, and said truly, that the railways do not want the crustaceous formation or the isothermal theory or the Agricultural Report. I do not think they do; and I do not want to give it to them. I think the railways have no rights that we on this floor are bound to recognize except the right to be taxed and to carry the people for less than cost. If they wanted the public documents, we would not listen to their cry. Fortunate railways, that they do not!

Neither, he says, do the express companies—another disreputable portion of society, useless and contemptible. They do not want public documents, and it is well they do not; for they could not have them. They have no rights which we are bound to respect except the right to suffer taxation and receive abuse.

And so he went through the list to banks and manufactories. But when he had covered the whole class of disreputable people who do not want the public documents, why did he stop? Ah, Mr. Speaker, there was an important omission in this catalogue which was supplied by my friend from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] As I read the signs of the times, a majority of the people who dwell under the protection of these United States vote the republican ticket. They voted it two years ago; they voted it last fall. Why did my friend from Illinois forget, until the gentleman from Iowa told him, that the republican party do not want the franking privilege; that the last time they had an opportunity to speak they said in words as explicit as words could make the declaration, that they would abolish the franking privilege? My friend from Illinois had overlooked or forgotten the republican party. Where then, in the name of common sense, are the people who do want the franking privilege? When I pause for a reply I get it: "The grangers want it;" and inasmuch as the grangers, so far as I can judge, want everything, let us admit that they want these public documents.

Just here again I strike squarely against and take issue with the gentleman from Illinois. I am not a granger, and I do not want to give them what they want. I say it very boldly. [Laughter.] I do not like granger principles. The grangers did not nominate me; the grangers did not vote for me. The republican party nominated me; the republican party voted for me, and I can know no other. I shall be loyal to the sentiments of the republican party ever; I shall stand by the principles which the republican party has declared ever, and I shall yield my loyalty to the republican party, and give in my fealty to this new party of the grangers, never, never—unless they should happen to establish granges in the northern part of New Jersey. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I find that in discussing this franking privilege I have got into the printing house; and that, as my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] said, is the real issue. This is our best argument. If you revive the franking privilege you revive all the abuses of the public printing; and a blow aimed at the franking privilege is a blow aimed at the printing house. May blows fall so many, so heavy, that this country may be saved the wasteful expenditure which proceeds from that source. Who would regret the fall of the Printing Bureau? Who really wants these public documents? Does it never occur to our friends that the inexorable laws of trade—those which even a paternal government cannot always successfully interfere with—show that the people do not want them? There is no town or village in this country where a traveler cannot go to any second-hand book-shop and buy any public document—whether it be the Agricultural Report, the Patent-Office Report, the crustaceous formation, or the silurian period—by paying a little more than its worth as old paper.

Evidently the demand is small, and we can easily answer it by providing a system by which reports, which contribute to the education of our people in political matters, may be brought more economically within their control; sending a few copies to the public libraries or enabling all who wish to own them to purchase them at their real cost. If we are bound, notwithstanding what I think is forcibly urged, to furnish information, do not, for pity's sake, distribute Patent-Office Reports, nor give the people the Agricultural Reports. Certainly let us not send down to our districts any more treatises on the isothermal lines, or crustacean formations, or silurian periods, or salary grabs, or any one of these things. [Laughter.] If we must tax the many to give books to the few, let us give them the spelling-book, the arithmetic, the reading-book—something that will really benefit them, which they will appreciate, which will make them better citizens, and more sure to vote the republican ticket. [Laughter.]

I said I opposed this measure in the interest of economy. I oppose it now in the interest of that universal justice which we all praise as we do economy, but which we refuse to practice just as we do economy. [Laughter.] But my borrowed time allows only a question on this point. Is it fair to the people of these United States to tax them all, A, B, C, and D, all down to Z, in order that we may give a book to A? I claim this is not republican doctrine. It is wrong; and we have no business to compel fifty people to pay taxes to give a luxury to one.

Before my time is out notice one section of the bill—I think it is the third—which speaks of the country editor, and this is a point I approach with the greatest reluctance. [Laughter.]

In my district, as in the district of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] we do not have any large cities, we do not have any metropolitan press; but we do have a number of most worthy country editors—estimable men. [Laughter.] I would love to stop here and pass an encomium upon the virtues of these gentlemen, but my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who like myself has no metropolitan press in his district, but a number of country papers, has anticipated me. With such exquisite grace has he painted the picture of the editor who sits in his country office that I yield in despair. That editor is never hurried; he forms no hasty opinions; he waits until he has consulted the county, and then, at the end of the week, passes his opinion upon the doings of Monday—and rests. [Laughter.] Just as the grangers keep my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in awe, just so do I tremble before the editors of the county. As the grangers receive from him love mingled with awe, so do these editors receive from me peculiar tokens of respectful consideration. And do they not deserve them? They have a hard, hard time, and through it all are faithful and true to the humblest of their representatives. When you are in your chair, Mr. Speaker, and I am at my desk in the Sleepy Hollow at your left, your eye I never catch, but I catch the eye of my country editor every time. [Great laughter.] If I go down stairs, to make myself clean at the country's expense, or go down to strengthen myself by eating a few oysters at my own expense, and a malevolent member on the other side of the House calls for the yeas and nays during my absence, he sees me, and records the fact that I dodged. [Great laughter.] If it should happen, through some mistake, that I do catch the Speaker's eye, or some gentleman yields me thirty minutes of his time, you, Mr. Speaker, do not listen to me; few of my fellow-members in this House listen to me, (I do not blame them for not listening,) but I am strengthened by the thought that I am talking away beyond you and beyond them for the constituency which I have the honor so imperfectly to represent, and that, as the watch-dog of this constituency, the country editor, listens to me, he hears every word, and that as it pleases or displeases him it will either mar or make me. [Laughter.]

If such my respect for the country editor, imagine the feelings with which I regard the ingenuity of the committee who present to us an assafetida pill and coat it with delicious sugar. I can speak against the free distribution of public documents through the mails, but how can I speak against my country editor, who only wants a free use of the United States mail to distribute my praises?

This all comes from the skill this House has attained in putting a man in a false position by the practice of our Mondays. It is something terrible; it is something most deplorable. We have acquired such skill in framing our resolutions, that it is impossible nowadays to get a bill whose right and whose wrong "any fellow can find out." When I read through this bill I said, "O, my prophetic soul, this is after the fashion of Monday resolutions." If you want to help your country editor, you must vote for franking. If you want franking, you must vote for your country editor.

Does not this bill read like Monday after the morning hour?

> Whereas the earth is round, and whereas the sun is warm, and whereas if you are virtuous you will be happy; and whereas we wish the world to be round, and we wish the sun to be warm, and we wish ourselves to be happy: Therefore,
> Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that we should issue an unlimited quantity of convertible bonds bearing 3.65 interest.

In this stress, all that I can say in behalf of my country editors is this: that I do not believe that they want to obtain favors at the expense of the country. I believe that they are good enough men (as my friend from Ohio has said so much better than I can say it; I am sending his speech to them and not my own.) I believe they are so good men, so truly anxious for the welfare of this country, so invariably kindly, especially to the city press, that we may assume that they would rather relinquish privileges than cause injustice. And I remember to have heard a day or two ago my democratic friend from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] who speaks a great deal, and therefore says a great deal that is wise, [laughter]—I remember having heard him say that it is not the business of the country to give privileges even to the deserving; that its only business is to do justice. Let this Government, then, fulfill its sole and proper function, to do justice. Let it refuse all privileges, even to the deserving. I know the country editor will be the last to complain.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. MONROE.) The time of the gentleman has expired.

Several MEMBERS. Go on; go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the gentleman may proceed. The Chair hears none.

Mr. PHELPS. There is an amendment to this bill. "It was not always so." When this bill was first presented by the committee it was not there. The amendment is in italics, as much as to say, "Beware!" And I ask gentlemen to lend me their attention for a few moments while I state why the committee introduced the amendment, and urge all my republican friends if they must pass this bill to see that they pass it with the amendment in. Briefly, when this bill was reported without the amendment, it came to the ear of a gentleman upon the committee that another democratic friend of mine from New York was preparing a circular which he intended to send next fall, under the exercise of the franking privilege, to all republican districts. He was enabled to obtain a copy of this circular; it was found to be short—in that respect, of course, unlike my friend—but, on the whole, witty, as my friend is always witty; but it was terribly damaging to the republican party.

It was a notice to this effect to the republican voters: "Your leaders two years ago promised to repeal the franking privilege if you put them in power. You put them in power. They kept their promise; they repealed the franking privilege. You put them in power the next year, and they controlled the House by a two-thirds vote. And what did they do then? Like Jeshurun, when they waxed fat they kicked; they broke in your face the promises that they had made, and re-enacted the franking privilege." This was the substance of the circular.

Under these circumstances, I ask my republican friends in this House—I have nothing to say to my friends on the other side—ought we not, if we pass this bill, to see that there is in it this amendment? For the provision is carefully drawn that the republican postmaster, if at any time, which would be about September, he thought the public welfare required it, (and no doubt he would so think if a number of such circulars were deposited in the post-office,) might, in that case, retain these circulars "in whole or in part for thirty days," or until the country was carried safely over the Pennsylvania election. I assure you he would retain them "in whole." The amendment is important. If we pass this bill let us pass the amendment with it. It is our only safety.

And when we pass the amended bill, let us do it in a creditable manner. A bad deed derives some merit from a bold performance. Let us be bold in this. Let us own up that it is the original Jacobs. Let us take off the silk hat; let us wash away the dye, and surrender all pretenses. Let us so act that the people will not despise us, though they censure. If we attempt to deceive, we shall only win contempt. They are as intelligent as we are. We cannot deceive them. We shall fail in the attempt.

It is therefore better policy, as it is better manhood, if we purpose to re-enact the franking privilege, not to do it by this bill, but to do it boldly and openly. Take and adopt the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] and by it tell the people that we do re-enact the franking privilege. Do not let us ever again make the mistake of attempting to deceive them by a false issue.

Mr. PLATT, of New York. I now yield to my colleague [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] the remainder of my time.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, the progress of this debate has shown that the free distribution of documents and the lavish expenditure for public printing are Siamese twins, which depend for life upon each other. If you kill one definitely and forever, you make an end of the other also. In the last Congress the franking privilege was scotched, but not killed. The mass of books piled up in the basement of this Capitol shows the vitality of Chang. Every book which has been piled up below has been a prop upon which the carcass of Eng has been set up, until now a new life is to be bestowed, and we are asked to admire again and sustain again these Siamese twins.

Sir, it is not worth while for us to exaggerate the cost involved in this matter. The public printing ordered by Congress last year amounted to something like $847,000, and that, too, without the Agricultural Report. In the preceding year we published two hundred and twenty-five thousand copies of the Agricultural Report, at a cost of $154,000. If you were to add, as you will do and as you have done this year, two Agricultural Reports, you will bring up the cost of your printing to nearly $1,200,000, of which nearly a million is dependent upon the restoration of the franking privilege. I suppose every gentleman will be willing to admit that the cost of distributing these congressional documents is at least $500,000 yearly. So that $1,500,000 is really the amount involved in the bill which comes from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Now, it becomes those who advocate this bill to show affirmatively why it should be passed. During at least a portion of this debate it has been assumed that the burden of argument rests with the negative. That is a sign of weakness. The supporters of this bill must show affirmatively that it ought to pass; and some of the gentlemen have attempted to do so. For example, it has been argued that it will cost nothing to restore the franking privilege as it is done by this bill, because the weight of the mails does not affect the cost of transportation; yet, turning immediately about, these very same gentlemen protest against cheap postage for newspapers, because the weight of the mails does determine the cost of the transportation.

The advocates of the bill also plead, "You must give the franking privilege to us because in other districts you have certain local advantages, and we must have the franking privilege to balance the account." If that argument amounts to anything, then the franking privilege should be confined to those districts which have not the free delivery of letters in cities; which have not public buildings to which gentlemen refer; which have not appropriations for rivers and harbors; which have no consideration whatever at the hands of the Government. O, no; that is too thin an argument. This is a bill covering the whole country, and the argument to sustain it must be as broad as the country.

And so it is that my enthusiastic friend from Missouri, [Mr. PARKER,] and my distinguished friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. HAZELTON,] insist that it is necessary that the franking privilege should be restored in order to disseminate education, in order to defend the liberties of the people.

Eighteen hundred documents sent every year into each congressional district, if we may believe these gentlemen, are the great elements of national education; they are the great defenders of our institutions. Our institutions, according to that argument, rest not upon ideas, not upon virtue, not upon the self-sacrifice of the people, but upon patronage and on subsidies.

Sir, in the last days and the worst days of the Roman Empire the emperors were wont to bind the people and their soldiers to them by largesses. And now we are asked to bind the people to their institutions by free books, by free distribution of mail matter. Mr. Speaker, has it come to this, that the sole defense of our Republic is a free book sent into a congressional district? Has it come to this, that the only hope of the Republic is that we may stick the citizen to its institutions by a free stamp?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. Certainly.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does the gentleman understand that anybody has argued upon this floor that it is the giving of the book, and not the circulation of the knowledge it contains, that strengthens the Republic?

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I understand that this bill is for the free distribution of books. And the argument is that by the Agricultural Reports, by the documents that go from this House, we are defending and protecting our institutions.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. My question is, if I do not disturb the gentleman——

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. Not at all.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Whether he understood anybody to argue that it was the gift of the book, and not the circulation of the knowledge it contains, that strengthened the Republic?

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I will come to that. The gentleman assumes that this knowledge will not reach the people in any other way than by the free distribution of documents; otherwise the argument amounts to nothing.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I merely asked the gentleman if he understood anybody to take the position to which he was replying, that it was the gift of the book alone——

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I say that the argument made in the last Congress by the gentleman from Massachusetts was that this information would not reach the people except by free distribution. I am replying precisely to that argument.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. Certainly.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I understand the gentleman to assume that somebody supposes this to be a gift, a largess, a bribe to the people, by which the Republic is strengthened. Now, the argument to which the gentleman said he was replying was not that.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I trust this will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Certainly; I will ask that.

The argument the gentleman is replying to is that it is the gift of the book, and not the knowledge so disseminated, and which would not be disseminated in any other way, which strengthened the Republic.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. But, Mr. Speaker, the point I make is this: That this knowledge and all other important information will reach the people in other ways, and this pretense that free distribution is essential to the dissemination of knowledge is an absurdity on its face.

Now, Mr. Speaker, "men love the banks where they deposit." People do not prize that which they get for nothing. The bill which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has introduced proposes a means by which public documents shall be cheaply distributed; and with some amendments I would favor his bill. Let the Government print only what is necessary for its own work; give every one who may ask for them copies at a nominal price; only, Mr. Speaker, let us no longer put legislators in the rôle of colporteurs.

But this pill, which comes from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, is, as my witty friend from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] said, "sugar-coated." It is proposed to crown the weekly newspapers as "dead-heads," and in that way to separate them from the great metropolitan journals of the cities. Now, Mr. Speaker, the country journals have not asked for this consideration. Gentlemen may understand once for all that those journals do not ask for charity, and by such a measure gentlemen will buy neither the approval nor the silence of those newspapers. They are as independent as their metropolitan cousins. They do not propose to surrender a principle to secure a trifling benefit. The clause which has been introduced in the bill would gratify the subscribers of country newspapers, and would benefit them more than it would the newspapers themselves. Newspapers have learned that the costliest obligations incurred by them are as "dead-heads," and not one of them whose life is worth living will accept this thin coat of sugar at the cost of so much gall and wormwood.

Mr. Speaker, country newspapers, and the people as a class, have pronounced, in many ways, their opposition to the idea of subsidy. They have denounced Congress hitherto for its greediness for perquisites; and I venture to say that so small a bribe as a book sent free, so small a bribe as country newspapers distributed free, will not induce the people, will not induce country editors, to abandon their denunciations against subsidies, whether under the great standard of grants to railroads and concessions to steamships, or in the meaner and more petty form embodied in this bill.

I thank my colleague [Mr. PLATT] for the time he has so courteously yielded to me.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I yield for a moment that the gentleman from New York [Mr. MELLISH] may have an amendment read.

Mr. MELLISH. I ask to have read for information the amendment I send to the desk

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert as follows:

That from and after the 1st day of July, 1874, postage for any distance within the United States on all written matter shall be at the rate of two cents per ounce or fraction thereof; and on all printed matter at the rate of one half cent per two ounces or fraction thereof; and the postage-stamps to be used under this law shall indicate on their face the quantity and kind of matter for which they will pay; but such stamps may be employed at their face value for either written or printed matter. And all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who wishes to present a report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

DUTIES ON IMPORTED FRUITS.

Mr. KELLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report a bill in relation to customs duties on imported fruits, and to ask for its immediate passage.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the repayment of all duties heretofore paid on imported fruits until further legislation by Congress authorizing the same, or until a decision of a court of the United States requiring the same, from which decision the Attorney-General shall certify that the United States will not take an appeal or writ of error.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] whether this bill does not debar the Attorney-General from taking an appeal on this matter from the decision of a district or circuit court?

Mr. KELLEY. On the contrary, it suspends payment until the Attorney-General shall decide whether he will take such appeal.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the point I want to get at. I do not want to place this power in the hands of the Attorney-General. I know that in the case of the refund of duties on ribbons the money was taken out of the Treasury of the United States, in consequence of the Attorney-General failing, in my judgment, to do his duty, and declining to take an appeal of the case to a higher court.

Mr. KELLEY. If my colleague will permit me, I will say that this bill simply suspends the repayment of these duties. A bill on this subject has already passed the House and is now before the Senate. There are now some thirty or forty cases, involving hundreds of thousands of dollars, awaiting only the signature of a single officer before the money shall be paid. The Committee on Ways and Means deem it desirable that this bill should be passed to suspend payment in such cases until the bill now pending in the Senate shall be passed.

Mr. RANDALL. I should prefer that the proposition should merely prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury from the repayment of any money and go no further; because I maintain that the Attorney-General, on a question of refunding so enormous an amount or duties, should have the judgment of the highest court. In other words, I am not willing to leave the matter discretionary with any Attorney-General.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, this does not leave it with the Attorney-General. It leaves it until there has been adjudication.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. At least so far as the Attorney-General shall certify he does not carry it further. The bill has been already passed by the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not legislating for the Senate but for the House. I wish to state to the House that when you give that power you go far enough; but the Attorney-General should not have the right upon the decision of the lower courts to cease to prosecute further the claim of the United States.

Mr. BURCHARD. The proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would prohibit the repayment of the money by the Secretary of the Treasury in all cases, even though the court decided it ought to be paid. Hence the latter part of the resolution was unanimously agreed to by the committee, so that in case the court should on full consideration of this section of the statute decide that money had been wrongfully collected, then the Secretary of the Treasury might have the power to repay it. The question there involved has not yet been passed on by the court.

Mr. RANDALL. Neither was it in the ribbon case.

Mr. BURCHARD. It only provides, so far as the Attorney-General is concerned, that upon the decision of the court, if the Attorney-General is satisfied with the decision, it ought not to be appealed, and should so certify, then the Secretary of the Treasury may make payment.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to warn the House of this matter of danger. The celebrated ribbon case was gotten through in this way precisely. There were various decisions; I think three. It was decided in the circuit court, and then came to the Attorney-General, who gave a certificate or wrote a letter to the Secretary declaring he would not appeal. I do not know the amount of money refunded in that case, but I believe it went to the extent of some half a million. I am told there are $2,000,000 involved in this matter. Now, for one, I will not stand here and give this right to the Attorney-General. I will not give him the power by his mere ipse dixit to take $2,000,000, or $2,000, or any other amount, large or small, of money out of the Treasury until after appeal to the highest court, and decision by that court has been had that the Government of the United States is bound in good faith or in law to refund this money.

Mr. KELLEY. There has been no adjudication.

Mr. RANDALL. Nor was there in the ribbon case.

Mr. KELLEY. I thought there were two or three decisions in that case.

Mr. RANDALL. There was no decision on appeal to the highest tribunal. There were decisions in the lower courts.

Mr. KELLEY. This is to guard against these very things of which the gentleman complains, and provides no money shall be refunded until the case has been decided.

Mr. RANDALL. It gives the right, when the Attorney-General states he will not take an appeal from the decision of the lower court, to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay back this money. Does it not authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to do that?

Mr. KELLEY. It does.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the whole question, then.

Mr. KELLEY. There must be a decision. Many warrants are now awaiting signature to carry hundreds of thousands of dollars out of the Treasury, and I hope this will pass, to prevent it until there has been a decision.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman assisted me, or rather I assisted him, in the ribbon case I have before alluded to, in trying to prevent money improperly being taken from the Treasury of the United States. Yet, with all our forethought and knowledge of legislation in that case, because of the refusal of the Attorney-General to take an appeal from the decision of the lower court to the Supreme Court of the United States, there was taken out of the Treasury some half a million dollars.

Mr. KELLEY. Remembering the efforts of my colleague in that instance, I cannot understand why he should interpose objection at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. I interpose only so far as to provide that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not pay out, or in any way refund, duties until there has been an appeal to, and the question has been decided by, the Supreme Court. When it is a question of law I wish to go further, and instruct the Attorney-General to take an appeal to the higher court and get a judgment in that higher court before anybody is authorized to take money out of the Treasury in this way.

Mr. KELLEY. That bill passed this House and was sent to the Senate. This is to arrest immediate action so far as the Treasury is to be largely depleted, and is for that service alone—to obtain a judicial decision on this point alone.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish to object unnecessarily, and will modify my proposition so it will read, "that no money shall be paid until after the final decision of the Supreme Court."

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that this is intended to harmonize with the resolution of the House passed the other day. We have to guard the rights of the citizens on the one hand, and the rights of the United States on the other.

There is now an emergency. It was reported when that bill passed the House the other day that the Secretary would suspend further payments out of that fund until the Senate had reasonable time to act upon it. The Secretary now informs us that he does not deem himself authorized to withhold these payments until there is some direct authority in that direction conferred by Congress. To meet that emergency the committee recommend this resolution now before the House, by which, if it passes both bodies, all payments will be at once suspended. Not another dollar can be paid, on account of this disputed matter, from the Treasury unless Congress shall by further legislation authorize it to be done, or unless the suits now instituted shall have reached decision in a court of the United States, and that decision shall be so clearly right and free from doubt that the highest legal authority of the United States shall say that it is not the interest of the United States to carry them by appeal or writ of error to the Supreme Court. In this respect it is exactly what the bill provided which passed the House last Monday week.

Mr. RANDALL. That did not go far enough.

Mr. KASSON. The object of it is this: If citizens have rights dependent on this action as well as the United States, it is their interest that their case shall be made up clearly, and that they shall get on a regular trial a decision of a United States judge, presumed to be incorruptible, after the full hearing of evidence; then the citizens should not be delayed in obtaining justice by the ipse dixit of the Attorney-General. In other words, just as the United States protects itself in one case by the ipse dixit of the Attorney-General, so the citizen in the corresponding case shall be entitled to the same protection against any delay of justice. That is the whole object of the resolution; and I submit to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that he ought not to say that the opinion of the Attorney-General shall weigh here in behalf of the United States and shall not weigh at all for the citizen. The gentleman must remember that the citizen also has interests to be protected.

Mr. RANDALL. I am remembering the interests of the citizen when I seek to prevent this money which comes into the Treasury from being taken out improperly. We enact tariff acts. The Treasury Department gives what is considered a fair interpretation of those acts. Under that interpretation moneys are collected. The importer comes in and states that that is not the true interpretation of the law, and an appeal is taken. Now, I want the Government to have the benefit of the highest judicial decision, not a decision of a petty local circuit court. If the money is to be taken out of the Treasury, I want that the highest judicial authority of the country shall be appealed to on behalf of the citizen as well as on behalf of the Government. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment I have suggested.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out these words:

"A decision of a court of the United States requiring the same, from which decision the Attorney-General shall certify that the United States will not take an appeal or writ of error."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

The final decision of the Supreme Court.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. KELLEY. I would suggest that the joint resolution be changed into the form of a bill.

The SPEAKER. The change can be made by unanimous consent.

The joint resolution was changed to a bill, (H. R. No. 2191,) and was received and read a first and second time.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATUS OF INDIANS.

Mr. SHANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and is hereby, instructed to investigate and report to the House the status of the Indians in the limits of the United States and Territories as to citizenship, under the Constitution of the United States, with such suggestions as may seem proper and just touching their titles to property, and to other rights and privileges, in view of past treaty stipulations and laws and executive orders concerning them, or any of them; said committee to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SHANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH W. GOLDTHORP.

Mr. BARBER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2192) for the relief of Joseph W. Goldthorp, late private of the First Regiment of Kansas Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

UTE INDIANS IN COLORADO.

Mr. McNULTA, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2193) to ratify an agreement with certain Ute Indians in Colorado, and to make an appropriation for carrying out the same; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF DETROIT RIVER.

Mr. FIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2194) to authorize the removal of bowlders from the channel of the Detroit River, and for the establishment of a light-ship on the shoals at the mouth of said river; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

POVERTY ISLAND LIGHT-HOUSE.

Mr. FIELD, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2195) for the relief of the workmen employed in the construction of Poverty Island light-house, Lake Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL BOUNTY.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2196) to extend the time for the filing of claims for additional bounty, under the act of July 28, 1866; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

S. B. SPURLOCK AND A. AND L. FAULKNER.

Mr. HARRISON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution, which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the Clerk of the House the papers in his Department in relation to the claim of S. B. Spurlock, Asa Faulkner, and Lewis Faulkner, against the United States, now before the Committee on War Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, was granted leave of absence for one week.

Mr. LEACH was granted leave of absence for four days.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, was granted leave of absence for one week.

Mr. SPEER. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ADAMS: The petition of Esther McDowell, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 25, 1874.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. OWEN, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FENTON. I present the petition of Henry S. Van DeCarr and Elsie M. Reynolds, administrator and administratrix of the estate of Rensselaer Reynolds, deceased, and Gordon B. Reynolds, of Stockport, in the county of Columbia, State of New York, praying for an enabling act. It relates to a patent. Accompanying this petition are some affidavits, which are submitted, sustaining the case. I move the reference of the papers to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON presented the memorial of William H. Babcock, who was a private in Company C, One hundred and seventy-seventh Regiment New York Volunteers, in the late war, asking the passage of an act granting him a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present the memorial of Le Grand Marvin and Isaiah Acre, citizens of Buffalo, in the State of New York, asking that there be published at stated periods, monthly or quarterly, a list of the publications made by Congress, with their weight, their size, their subject-matter, and the prices at which they can be furnished, with the postage from Washington to the various localities in the States. I think myself that this is a provision which we should have. It obtains in England, and it would lead undoubtedly to the sale of the documents of Congress, that are cut off largely probably by the abolition of the franking privilege at this time. The memorialists also protest against the renewal of the franking privilege. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented the petition of farmers and working-men of Mason County, Michigan, praying that national currency be substituted for Treasury notes, made a full legal tender for all public and private debts, and for an interconvertible United States bond bearing 3.65 per cent. interest, payable in lawful money; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of the Universalist church of Table Grove, Illinois, signed by Rev. J. Hughes, pastor, and other officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Chicago, suggesting modifications of the customs laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS presented the memorial of Nathaniel Kuykendail, of Hampshire County, West Virginia, praying compensation for extra service for carrying the mail from Romney to Clarksburgh, in Virginia, for four years and a half, commencing in the year 1839; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of the New Garden monthly meeting of the Society of Friends, of Chester County, Pennsylvania, signed by the clerks, George Thompson and Sarah W. Linville, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of John B. Chapman, praying the enactment of a law to carry into effect the act of February 14, 1873, providing for the payment of his claim against the Government for services rendered as special agent to the Osage Indians in 1861 and 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the memorial of Arthur McArthur and other citizens of Washington, remonstrating against permission being granted to any railroad company to lay another track on Twelfth street, Washington City; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FENTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Anson Atwood, of Troy, New York, praying an extension of his patent for railroad-car wheels, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Patents.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Julia A. Nutt, of Mississippi, administratrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, praying payment for quartermaster's stores taken by the United States forces, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 384) for the benefit of the Louisville and Bardstown Turnpike Company, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Susan Vincent, widow of Frederick Vincent, praying to be repaid a balance of money advanced by the firm of Le Caze & Mallet in aid of the Government during the revolutionary war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 536) granting a pension to Livanna Ingraham; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FENTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 537) for the extension of the patent known as Reynolds's patented brake for power-looms; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

STATUE OF JEFFERSON.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report on the resolution referred to the committee, instructing them to "consider the expediency of providing for the protection of the statue of Jefferson now in the open air in the grounds of the Executive Mansion, the same being a work of art by an eminent French sculptor." The committee submit a report which I send to the desk, and after it is printed I shall call the attention of the Senate to the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be laid on the table, and printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It seems that there is some confusion as to the action of the House and Senate, both Houses having at different times taken action thereon, but it is a matter of some doubt whether action on the same resolution or not; and if there is any doubt about it or any defect, it ought to be cured by legislation now. The committee therefore report a joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) in relation to the bronze statue of Jefferson presented to Congress by Uriah P. Levy, late an officer in the United States Navy, was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

NAVAL MONUMENT IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire as to the expediency of erecting in the city of Washington the naval monument now in process of construction by Franklin Simmons.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask that Senate bill No. 343, for the relief of purchasers of lands sold for direct taxes in the insurrectionary States, be printed. It is a general bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMERON. I believe it was understood last week that this day, after the morning hour, should be devoted to the bill in relation to the centennial exhibition. I move that we now take up that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Calendar be postponed, and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1394, in relation to the centennial exhibition.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I hope not. We should go on with the Calendar during the morning hour. The Senate is very thin now, and that is an important bill. I think the remaining minutes of the morning hour should be devoted to the transaction of the ordinary business of the session, and at the expiration of the morning hour we can take up this bill, which is a general order, and dispose of it or do whatever we think proper with it.

Mr. CAMERON. At the suggestion of some Senators, I am willing that this motion should go over informally for the present. I do not wish to interfere with the private bills of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator withdraws the motion, then?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, sir.

LAND LOCATED BY MILITARY LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. WRIGHT. It will be remembered that on Thursday last I introduced a memorial from the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, touching the right of the State to 5 per cent. upon certain lands that were entered in that State by military land warrants. I gave notice at that time that either on Friday morning or the first morning I could get the floor I would introduce a bill on that subject, and would crave the indulgence of the Senate for five or ten minutes while I made some explanation of the bill. I now present the bill according to previous notice, and if the Senate will indulge me, I ask not to exceed ten, and perhaps not over five, minutes to explain it.

Leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 538) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent to be heard for a few minutes in explanation of this bill. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, the Federal Government in receiving Iowa into the Union stipulated that that State should have paid to it 5 per cent. on the sales of the public lands entered therein. This compact was the same in substance that was entered into with very many of the Western and Southern States admitted before and after that time In return for this, on the part of Iowa and the other States named, the States then admitted stipulated, among other things, first, that they would never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil; second, that they would never tax for any purpose the public lands in such States; third, that the lands or property of non-resident proprietors should never be taxed higher than the lands or property of resident proprietors; and, fourth, there was an obligation that for three years there was to be no tax on lands granted for military service in the war of 1812.

There were, then, in the act of admission of Iowa these four stipulations on the part of the State, and one stipulation on the part of the Federal Government, that the State should have 5 per cent. on the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands. These or similar provisions were also contained in the acts of admission of the other States so far as the obligations of the States were concerned, not in terms the same but in substance the same. This obligation on the part of the Government to pay this 5 per cent. was recognized as important by the State or States at the time, and appreciated as such; and so in return for this promise on the part of the Federal Government to pay this 5 per cent. was the obligation or undertaking or agreement of the States appreciated and recognized as important on the part of the Federal Government. I refer to the stipulation not to tax for three years the lands that were entered under military land warrants granted for service in the war of 1812, the stipulation in reference to non-resident and resident proprietors, and with reference to the primary disposal of the soil, &c.

For the most part, so far as this 5 per cent. is concerned, touching sales for cash in these several States, it has been paid; in other words, the Federal Government has observed its obligation so far as the payment of the 5 per cent. upon sales made for cash. Commencing with 1776 and running through 1812 and 1814 to 1847 and 1850, Congress passed many acts giving lands and scrip, one or both, as inducements for soldiers to enlist in the service of the Government, to soldiers to enter either the volunteer or other service, and for wars that were then pending or just concluded; that is to say, as an inducement to soldiers to enlist in the service of the Government in the war of 1812, in the war of 1776, and in the war of 1846, as in the late war there was a promise on the part of the Government to pay to the soldiers who might enlist in such service money, and also to pay them lands or scrip. Under the warrants that were thus given to the soldiers, or with the scrip that was received by the soldiers in place of land, a large quantity of land was entered in Iowa and in these other States.

More than fifteen years since, the authorities of my State applied to the proper Department for compensation, or rather to be paid 5 per cent. upon the net proceeds of the lands that were entered with this scrip and these warrants, estimating the lands at $1.25 per acre. The Department at that time did not regard that, in a question involving so much, they were justified in giving such a construction to the law. Soon afterward the war of the rebellion followed, and thus the claim has been suspended until this time.

The question presented by this bill, and to which I shall ask the attention of the Senate when it shall come up for final consideration, is, were these lands entered by these military land warrants, and by this scrip, "sales" within the meaning of the act of admission; in other words, whether the State of Iowa and these other States are entitled to 5 per cent. upon the lands that were thus entered, estimated at $1.25 an acre, as well as sales of lands for cash, within the meaning of the act? I submit, Mr. President, (and that is all I propose to say at this time,) that upon any rule applicable to the construction of contracts, and as applied to the word "sale," these lands were sold within the meaning of the law.

It will be observed that these lands were offered to these soldiers before they enlisted, and as an inducement to them to enlist in the service of the Government. It will be observed that it was as much a part of the compensation given to them as was the money at eight or sixteen dollars a month. It was as much what was given to them in consideration for their hire as if it had been money. And when you come to reflect that this scrip was recognized by the law as money, to be accepted by the officers of the Government as money just as much as gold was, in the entry of the lands, it seems to me there can be no question but that it comes up to the full definition of the word "sale" as understood in the law. It seems to me also that it was a contract within the meaning of the law as just stated, and a contract that the Government cannot escape from.

Mr. President, I have said that this was a contract from which the Government cannot escape; for I understand the rule to be that a government has a will, has an understanding, has capacity to contract, and is susceptible of obligation and of laws. Chancellor Kent, speaking upon this subject, uses this language:

> That a law embodying a contract, duly passed and promulgated, thenceforward becomes the law of the land, and that it is as binding upon Congress as upon the people or any other branch of the Government, or as a contract would be binding upon the Government executed under the authority of law.

And upon a question not very dissimilar from the question I now present, as to whether this was a contract within the meaning of the law and whether this was a sale within the meaning of the law and the obligation of the Government under such circumstances, I read as follows. It seems that the Continental Congress toward the close of the revolutionary war passed a resolution to the effect that the officers and soldiers engaged in the same should have half-pay for life on account of their great sufferings, &c. A report obtained in the Army that Congress did not mean to comply with this pledge, which produced much uneasiness. In reference thereto General Washington used this language:

> I think it unnecessary to say anything more than just to observe that the resolutions of Congress now alluded to are as undoubtedly and absolutely binding on the United States as the most solemn acts of confederation or legislation. As to the idea, which I am informed has in some instances prevailed, that the half-pay and commutation are to be regarded merely in the odious light of a pension, it ought to be exploded forever.

So I say that, so far as these lands are concerned, to treat them simply in the light of a bounty, instead of a part of the contract that was offered to these soldiers, ought to be exploded forever.

> That provision should be viewed as it really was, a reasonable compensation, offered by Congress, at a time when they had nothing else to give, to officers of the Army for services then to be performed; it was the only means to prevent a total dereliction of the service. It was a part of their hire. I may be allowed to say it was the price of their blood and of your independency. It is, therefore, more than a common debt. It is a debt of honor; it can never be considered as a pension or gratuity, nor canceled till it is fairly discharged.

When these lands were offered to these soldiers the Government had more lands than money, and they therefore, instead of promising to pay twice or thrice the amount per month in money, agreed to pay them so much in money and the balance in land. The Government has thus far observed its compact, and I will not doubt but that it will continue to observe that compact so far as these States are concerned. At the time the Government undertook to pay for these services in these lands and when they undertook to pay the State 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands, there was no exception that they would pay 5 per cent. upon cash entries and not pay 5 per cent. upon entries that were made by military land warrants.

In the next place, there was no provision, there was nothing suggesting a possibility, that for a purpose outside of the State all of these lands could be entered on warrants issued to soldiers that were to serve, not for the benefit of one State, but for the benefit of all the States alike.

In the next place I suggest, if any other construction can obtain this will follow, that the Government, for a purpose common to all the States, could have provided for the entry of these lands by military land warrants, and all the lands in the States could have been taken up by these warrants, and not a cent would have gone to the States under that provision of the compact; and it would hence have followed that the State would have obligated itself in all the respects I have mentioned, and yet not have derived one cent from the obligation on the part of the Government.

I only mention now, in conclusion, that the 5 per cent. derived from the sales of these lands in my State, as also in many other States, is set apart and dedicated to common schools. If this 5 per cent. shall be allowed Iowa and these other States, I understand that in almost all of them this is the obligation. I know of no higher duty devolving on the Government or the statesmen, here or elsewhere, than to look to the education of the masses.

Having said this much, and asking Senators to give this bill the attention and consideration that I think its importance demands, and looking at it with reference to the actual rights of the States and the obligation on the part of the Government, I ask that the bill may be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, to which the memorial was sent.

Mr. SARGENT. Before that reference is made I should like to inquire of my friend from Iowa how much money this bill will take out of the Treasury for the benefit of his own State, if he has made any calculation?

Mr. WRIGHT. I have not made any calculation. I have undertaken to present the principle upon which the bill is founded, and when it shall be examined on its merits and its details, if that shall influence the question at all, we can consider it.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator cannot answer that question, I should like to ask him another. I suppose it would be of some service to the committee in their deliberations to know how large an amount would be taken from the Treasury by this bill in this time of stringency; but if the Senator is not able to answer that question, I should like to ask him if he does not conceive that the same principle is also involved where the Government has taken homesteads, or given Indian scrip or agricultural college scrip, and where that scrip has been located in Iowa, or any other State which claims it has a right to 5 per cent. on the proceeds of the sales of the public lands—will not this bill be only an entering-wedge to pay 5 per cent. on those also?

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no disposition to go into the details of the bill now. I think a very clear distinction can be pointed out when it shall be finally considered, in which I hope to be able to satisfy the Senator.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not desire to embarrass the Senator's argument, but these are important propositions, which the committee should consider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LIQUOR-TRAFFIC COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now report the first bill on the Calendar.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, as has just been stated, this is a bill providing that the President shall appoint five eminent persons to inquire into "the alcoholic liquor traffic in its economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people," &c. I desire to say but a very few words on this subject. I agree perfectly with the opinions expressed the other day by the Senator from Connecticut, not now in his seat, [Mr. FERRY.] I think the passage of this bill would establish a precedent which would lead in the direction of legislation properly belonging to the sphere of State police, with which the national Government has nothing to do. The Senate will notice by merely looking at this bill that this is not a demand for ordinary parliamentary inquiry, but that it is a part of a general movement, as clearly appears from the character of the petitions upon which this bill is based. It is a movement, as we all know, in favor of prohibitory or coercive legislation in the States, and which now, as there is some reason to think, attempts to commit Congress in the same direction.

This inquiry is to be surrounded with greater solemnity, more than surrounds an ordinary parliamentary investigation. If we were merely to inquire into matters connected with our revenue laws, then I am sure our own committees would do the work just as well as the commission here proposed, and probably even better. Is there any ground for expecting, from the commission provided for in this bill, greater impartiality or more reliable information? Certainly not; but evidently a peculiarly impressive demonstration and special effect is to be produced by this unusual proceeding.

Now, I would respectfully ask, if we once launch Congress in that direction, what will it lead to? Sir, there are other abuses in society inviting inquiry just as well, and other evils for which remedies ought to be found.

There is, for instance, the vicious practice of gambling. The question might fairly be asked, whether gambling, in its effects upon society, is not in many respects just as dangerous as the habit of drinking?

There is another matter—the extravagance of the female sex in dress. Do we not all know that thereby expenses are created that have ruined many a family, driven business men into bankruptcy, and induced clerks and officers of banks and like institutions to rob their establishments and become criminals?

We might go still further and consider the fact that nothing is more apt to affect the mental and moral conditions of a man than the state of his digestive organs. We all know that indigestion sours the temper, makes men and women unsocial, may render a husband and father intolerable in his own household, may drive his wife to leave him and seek pleasure elsewhere, may disgust his children and drive them into the arms of bad company, thus destroying the morality and happiness of families, resulting in misery and crime; and, considering all this, we might institute a solemn inquiry to discover what are the effects upon society of the consumption of hot soda biscuits. And, going on in that way, we shall ultimately arrive at the necessity of establishing in this Government a bureau of public health and morals.

For my part, I am opposed to any such thing, being convinced that it will gradually drive the action of government into channels which are not embraced within the original principles and theory upon which it rests.

Now, gentlemen, do not understand me as being inclined to trifle with the temperance movement; not at all. In a certain sense I am a temperance man myself. It would, perhaps, be looked upon as improper if I spoke of my own carefulness as to my personal habits; but I may say that nothing is more repulsive to me than the sight of a drunken man, unless it be that of a drunken woman; nothing more loathsome to me than the aspect of a human being who degrades himself to the level of a beast.

Neither, sir, do I mean to show any disrespect to those who are engaged in the temperance movement. I am aware there are many worthy persons in it who mean to be earnest and very sincere philanthropists; and I may say that if I could do anything by judicious methods to extinguish the vice of drunkenness in this country without diverting the action of Government from its legitimate sphere, I should not hesitate to do so. But I do honestly believe that the movement of which this bill forms a part is one of misdirected zeal. I do candidly think that those engaged in it are taking hold of the thing at the wrong end.

Movements like the one now going on we have seen in this country many times within the last thirty years. They were always commenced with the same zeal and earnestness, carried on with the same means, for the same objects, and resulted always in the same failure; for the second movement was testimony of the failure of the first; the third, testimony of the failure of the second; and the present movement is testimony of the failure of all those that preceded it.

Now, sir, why is it that movements that run in the direction of prohibition or of legislative coercion usually fail? The reason is a very simple one. When you absolutely prohibit, or by force of law attempt to suppress, an indulgence which, when moderate, people will not consider morally wrong, then you will always fail. It is a matter of experience that where moderate indulgence does not detract from a man's character in public estimation, where whole families—husband, wife, and child—where all classes of society, mingle together in places of amusement, eat and drink what they please, at the same time listening to good music and amusing themselves together in a variety of ways, there the vice of drunkenness is far less frequent than elsewhere. Every observing traveler will confirm this statement.

It may be difficult to cultivate such social habits in any country. But I am convinced if the efforts now engaged in the temperance movement were turned in that direction, the result would be far more satisfactory than anything that can be accomplished by coercive or prohibitory legislation. They would then have the hearty cooperation of a great many who, although agreeing with the general objects of the movement as far as the extinction of the vice of drunkenness is concerned, are now repelled by the intolerant character of the movement. Human nature is so constituted that it wants, and will seek, pleasure, relaxation, social enjoyment. The pursuit of pleasure, carried to excess or misdirected, will be apt to lead to vicious habits, misery, and crime; but in the efforts to prevent or remedy such evils the general tendency of human nature in this respect must not be ignored.

The effective policy does, in my opinion, not lie in the direction of the forcible suppression of an indulgence which, if moderate, people will not consider morally wrong in itself; but the surest remedy is to substitute better pleasures for bad ones. No candid observer of human affairs can fail to recognize the good influence effected by the enjoyment of public pleasures by all the members of families together. That husband must be a miserable wretch indeed who in public would be willing to appear drunk before his wife and his children; and surely that young man would be an egregious fool, as well as a degraded being, who in public would like to appear drunk before his sweetheart and her family. In order to neutralize the vicious tendency of an indulgence it is best to couple it with the restraining influences of family life and with social enjoyments calculated to occupy the mind and to elevate our moral nature.

I think that the introduction of such social enjoyments as I have alluded to will effect more than all prohibitory laws and all efforts to put society in a strait-jacket. The coercive method on the other hand, will always tend to breed a set of hypocrites, and lead to reactions, upsetting all that seems to have been gained, as has time and time again been demonstrated in this country. By adopting the other method we may achieve a wholesome social reform, and confer a lasting benefit upon American society.

These are the reasons, and I express them with all respect to the sentiments of gentlemen who differ with me, that determine me to vote against this bill: first, because it directs the action of the Government into paths running beyond the limits of its legitimate powers; and, secondly, because it is to operate as an auxiliary to a movement which works in a direction which I consider wrong, and which will only lead to deplorable reactions and stand in the way of something better.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am a little sorry that my honorable friend from Missouri has made up his mind that he cannot afford to vote in support of the bill now before the Senate. I had come to a different conclusion myself, and I would very much rather be countenanced by the vote and the speech of the Senator from Missouri than to be discountenanced by either one or the other. I think he has given us, however, some very useful suggestions as to the method of prosecuting the temperance reform. Perhaps he has suggested the best method possible, perhaps he has not.

I rise, first, because to me was committed the privilege of introducing the bill now before the Senate; and, secondly, to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri and the attention of the Senate to the fact that here is no legislation proposed to interfere with the use of intoxicating drinks, to promote temperance, or to restrain intemperance. Here is a mere inquiry proposed, a mere investigation asked for. I think we can make such an inquiry as is suggested in this bill without stepping outside of the jurisdiction prescribed to the Government of the United States.

But a short time since it was suggested on this floor that officers connected with the government of this District had been guilty of mal-administration in some respects, and an investigation was asked for into that fact. It was at once accorded. So far as I remember now, there was no opposition made anywhere. Two or three years ago it was suggested on this floor that crime, very flagrant crime, was rampant in certain States of this Union between us and the Gulf. An investigation was asked, and an investigation was at once accorded. Later than that, it was said that great abuses existed in the administration of the customs service in the city of New York. An investigation was asked for. It was at once accorded. Each of these investigations was prosecuted with great diligence and at considerable cost.

About the same time it was suggested here on this floor, without any complaint coming to us from the outside world, that an officer of this Government had saved some money, or made some money, for the Treasury by selling arms to a foreign power, or to somebody else who had sold them to a foreign power. There was no complaint from any foreign power; but it was supposed that that was an abuse of power, or a misuse of power on the part of the officer, and an investigation was asked for. It was very promptly accorded.

Now there is in the United States a vast body of men whom my friend has referred to, and he has accorded to them them the high title of philanthropists; a very large body of men who for years have been taking counsel together as to the best methods of restraining and, if possible, of prohibiting the misuse, the abuse, of intoxicating drinks. They come to us this winter with the suggestion—and they come to us in great force, if numbers and character can give force to a suggestion—that if authorized so to do they can collect and lay before the national Legislature evidence touching the traffic in and the use of intoxicating drinks which may possibly suggest some profitable legislation to us, and will inevitably be of great value to the people of the United States. When that suggestion is made to us by such numbers and by such characters as have given their names to the petitions which have been presented to the Senate at this session, can we turn a deaf ear to it with any propriety whatever? Can we refuse to make that inquiry? If the inquiry should result in bringing before us hereafter a bill which my honorable friend or myself should think will not promote the welfare of the people of the United States, or which transcends the proper limits of national legislation, then it will be high time for himself, or for myself, to take a stand in opposition to that bill. Will it not be time enough then? Shall we compromise any right of the United States, any interest of its people, or any principle of the Constitution, if we forbear opposition until we are asked to do something which we ought not to do? I have not feared that any great principle or any great interest would be compromised by deferring opposition until we are asked to do something which ought not to be done. When we are invited to that labor, I hope I shall be ready to make such feeble opposition as I shall be able to do. At present I do not see that we are asked to take any such step. Therefore I shall be justified in voting for the bill.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, I certainly shall vote for the bill; and in doing this, I do not hesitate to say that I coincide with the suggestions made by my colleague a few days ago as to the tendency of the times to press upon the consideration of Congress questions which properly belong to the States. Notwithstanding this tendency, I think we may, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, make inquiry into this subject.

What are the facts? I shall not attempt to give a temperance lecture here; but every one knows that the evils of intemperance are to be seen in every city, and in every village, and at almost every corner, and in almost every family circle. This subject has agitated the minds of philanthropic and Christian men for generations, and they have made various efforts to check the progress of intemperance, to stop the sale and the traffic in intoxicating drinks. Those efforts have been made, as has been suggested by the honorable Senator from Missouri, by moral influences. Men have been presented with the strongest motives which appeal to the sense of morality and right, and they have been invited and urged by these motives to cease from selling, or from putting the glass to the mouth of those who use it as many think improperly; but this moral influence has failed to accomplish any great result. It has done good in instances, and there is no doubt that it is a proper influence to use. Other influences have also been at work. Efforts have been made to legislate so as to suppress the traffic and the use of ardent spirits; and attempts have been made to regulate the traffic so that it should produce as little evil as possible. None of these measures have yet accomplished the object which philanthropic and Christian men have in view.

And now the question is submitted to the Congress of the United States simply as one of inquiry, to ascertain what are the facts; and it seems to me that we may make that inquiry in the manner proposed; and the hope is, that when the inquiry shall be made it will be so thorough that it shall lead the American people to adopt some more effective measures to suppress the evil than have yet been adopted; or else it will show that we have no right to interfere with the traffic in ardent spirits and no right to attempt to impair the liberty of men to do as they please in matters of this kind. And if this inquiry shall do either, it will stop the agitation; it will stop the psalm-singing and the praying of the women in Ohio and Indiana; and it may be that that will be the best thing that could be done. I do not say it is the best; but I say I believe it is perfectly right for the Congress of the United States to make this inquiry, and let the country see what can be ascertained from it.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, one word on this subject. I advocate the bill with a great deal of earnestness. I look upon it as one of the most serious questions presented at this or any other session during this nation's history. Surely the inquiry ought to be made. The response I think ought to be favorable on the part of the Senate to the demand for this great inquiry. So far as I am concerned, I am not one of those who have any hesitancy as to the ability of Congress to legislate on the subject. I think the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States gives us abundant liberty to do so. It is surely for the welfare of this nation; and is there anything within metes or bounds that the nation is not to be benefited in thereby denying the power? If so, the Constitution is a failure; and I have not arrived at that conclusion by any means. I have no doubt about the power, and it certainly, in my opinion, ought to be exercised. My friend from Connecticut remarks in the proper strain——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate bill No. 432.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is there any opposition to taking the vote upon the bill at this time?

Mr. FLANAGAN. I shall be willing to take it myself. I am anxious to vote for it.

Mr. WRIGHT. If there be no objection I trust we may have a vote on the bill at once and get it out of the way.

Mr. MERRIMON. I desire to proceed with what I have to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina desires to discuss the bill, as the Chair understands.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will not the Senator from North Carolina be willing to let us take the vote on the bill? If there is any disposition to debate it, of course I shall not insist.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think it will excite a good deal of debate yet.

Mr. WRIGHT. I mean the bill now before the Senate; not the currency bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. I understand it is the bill to provide for a commission to inquire into the statistics of intemperance in this country.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MERRIMON. It has already excited considerable debate, and I think it will last some time to come.

Mr. WRIGHT. If there is no disposition to further debate it, has the Senator any objection to taking the vote?

Mr. MERRIMON. I have no objection to taking the vote.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to debate it. I desire to submit some views on the subject.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate, being Senate bill No. 432; and the pending question is on the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance with instructions.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg leave to remind the Chair that I had the floor yesterday at the hour of adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is reminded of that fact.

Mr. CAMERON. Before the currency bill comes up, I beg to remind the Senate that this day was set apart for the centennial bill. The morning hour was occupied by private bills until the present moment. I trust now that the centennial bill may be disposed of; and I hope the Senate will either take it up and dispose of it now, or fix some day when it shall have the attention of the Senate. As a test question, I will move that to-morrow, directly after the conclusion of the morning business, it be taken up by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has already set that bill as a special order for to-day; but it is displaced by the unfinished business of yesterday. The same thing would result if it be made a special order for to-morrow. It will maintain its place as a special order without any further action of the Senate, and can be called in order after the unfinished business.

Mr. CAMERON. Then I wish to remind the Senate that I gave way to-day out of respect to the private bills of Senators; and I trust that to-morrow they will forego their special bills for a little while in order to allow me to have my bill before the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. I am aware that the bill in relation to the centennial celebration may in some sense be regarded as an appropriation bill, and perhaps it may be a very important appropriation bill before we get through with it, probably amounting to a good many millions of dollars; but notwithstanding this, which gives it a character, perhaps a privilege, I shall certainly insist, with such force as I may, that the Senate shall not give a preference to a special appropriation bill over a regular appropriation bill, which the Committee on Appropriations have been trying for weeks to get the attention of the Senate to. At the proper time I shall endeavor to bring up, in advance of this special appropriation bill, the regular naval appropriation bill.

Mr. CAMERON. I am very sorry that the Senator from California will not agree to what I think is a very mild proposition on my part, a very small favor that I ask of the Senate; and that is to dispose of this bill to-morrow. I gave way to-day, as I have said before, to other Senators. I shall say nothing more now, but when to-morrow comes, the Senate will see that it will only be doing justice to me to let me bring up my bill. I will say no more about it now.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he allow his bill to take the chance of other bills in this Chamber, to be taken up when the financial question is disposed of.

Mr. CAMERON. O! [Laughter.] Mr. President, there was a very celebrated gentleman by the name of Micawber. I am not trusting anything to chance. Luck is a great thing; but I propose to take all reasonable precautions beforehand.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 919) to provide for the issuing and recording of commissions to postmasters appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;

A bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto;

A bill (H. R. No. 2186) granting an American registry to the American-built Peruvian steamship Rayo, now rebuilt in the United States and converted into a sailing-vessel; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2191) in relation to the customs duties on imported fruits.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 437) to restore William Kilburn, of San Francisco, California, to the Navy of the United States as an ensign.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870; the pending question being on the motion to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I listened with pleasure and profit to the able and well-considered speech of the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] delivered yesterday. I do not rise now to attempt any general reply to what was then so well said, or to express my dissent from many of the views which he stated in reference to various principles of political economy. On the contrary, I concur most heartily in much that he said. I complain and regret, however, that he did not devote more of his time to a discussion of what I conceive to be the practical issue before the Senate.

It is conceded generally that the constitutional, the true and desirable currency for this country, and indeed for all countries, is gold and silver. It is as generally conceded, however, that we cannot have it now; and that we shall not be able to have it for an indefinite period in the future. We have a purely credit currency. It grew out of the exigencies of the war. We have it, and we find it a very difficult matter to get rid of it. The exchanges of this country are effected by it. It is, indeed, an established system, and it must continue until the circumstances of the country will permit it to be changed and a gold and silver currency system substituted for it.

The question which I regret, I repeat, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] did not devote more time to yesterday—for it is upon that I desire above all things at this moment to be enlightened—is, inasmuch as we have a purely credit currency, and must have it for some time to come, is there a sufficient volume of it in the country to answer the legitimate demands of business? That is the simple question, and it seems to me it ought to be uninfluenced by any other in this discussion. Is there a sufficient volume of this credit currency to make the legitimate exchanges of the country easily and in the regular order of commercial transactions? I have contended, and other Senators have contended, that the volume is not sufficient. Others, on the other hand, have contended that it is not only sufficient, but that it is more than sufficient; and that so far from increasing this volume, it ought to be decreased. I do not concur in that view, and for reasons which I have submitted, a few of which I propose to recapitulate very briefly now.

The honorable Senator from Missouri devoted much time, and certainly he spoke very ably upon that view of the subject, against inflation, and especially inflation with an irredeemable currency. I do not understand that anybody here is willing to concede that he favors inflation. I am very sure I do not. On the contrary, I am as hostile to it as the honorable Senator or any other gentleman in the Senate. I deny emphatically that the proposition which is pending to increase the circulation $46,000,000 is a measure that tends to inflate the currency beyond what the legitimate demands of the country require; and therefore I desire to confine my remarks on this occasion to showing that the volume is not sufficient.

In the first place, we ascertain what the volume ought to be by a consideration of what was the condition of the country when we last had the normal currency of this country, to wit, gold and silver, and we go back to the year 1860. In that year enterprise and industry did not begin to approximate to what they are to-day; that will be conceded. We have not only made the ordinary progress of nations, but we have progressed in a ratio that is unparalleled perhaps in the history of the world within the last decade. In all industrial pursuits, in commercial pursuits, in science, in literature, and in every other way, we have progressed astonishingly. Our property and our wants have increased just in the same ratio. The estimated value of the real and personal property of the United States is $40,000,000,000. Our imports and exports for the last year exceeded $1,200,000,000. Our annual productions last year exceeded $6,000,000,000; and enterprise has been stimulated by the tremendous events that have transpired within the last ten years to a degree that astonishes the proudest, the most enterprising, the most far-seeing, and largest-calculating American.

Now let us see how the question of currency is affected by this increase of our wants. Anterior to the war, the bank circulation of the country, as reported by the Comptroller of the Currency, amounted to $238,671,210. That was the bank circulation in 1860. That bank circulation was predicated upon a gold and silver circulation equal to at least $100,000,000; and, besides, the paper circulation which then existed was convertible into and equal to gold itself. There was but a very small percentage difference between the gold and the paper currency at that time. It is safe to say, then, that if the bank circulation was $238,671,210, there were $100,000,000 of gold which supported it, and that would aggregate $338,671,210 of currency actively employed in the country in 1860, and that does not include the amount of gold which was used in the current transactions of the country. That was very considerable. That circulation was better than ours just in the proportion that a gold circulation is better than a pure credit circulation. If we increase this circulation 15 per cent., and that is the reasonable average of the discount of the greenback circulation, our present circulation, the aggregate would make an addition to the volume of circulation then in existence of $36,000,000. That would make the aggregate circulation at that time $374,671,210. That circulation was required in those peaceful times, when, although our country was marching along rapidly in the progress of civilization and development, no one could come near to having a conception of the progress we have made since that time.

I have adverted to the increase in our productions, the increase of our property, our population, &c.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to suggest another consideration?

Mr. MERRIMON. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator that before the war the paper issued by the banks of the South and West was not current in the East at all, and not current in the States of the South separated from each other, and bills of exchange were resorted to in a great body of commercial transactions which are now carried on by the actual exchange of currency.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is an important suggestion; and as the Senator has mentioned it, I will mention the further fact that at that time the circulation in the South and West was local, and there was no circulation in the country that circulated as the national and greenback circulation does now, except the currency of New York and the New England States.

What is our condition now in the matter of currency, and our circumstances in connection with that? We have a population now of forty-one million people. Five millions of the population that we had in 1860, and which is taken into the calculation in ascertaining the aggregate population of this country now, were then slaves. They have been made freemen since, and they have all the wants and all the necessities of a free population. They demand currency, and they demand it just to the extent that five million people would require it; and in that respect there is a necessity, and a very great necessity, for an increase of the currency to meet their wants.

But, sir, what is the volume of the circulation now—the volume of a circulation that is not equal to gold and silver, much as we desire that circulation, and it is to be regretted on all hands that we cannot have it? What is the volume of this depreciated circulation that we have? We have, in the first place, $354,000,000 of national-bank circulation; we have $356,000,000 of greenback circulation; we have $50,000,000 of what is called the fractional circulation, making in the gross $760,000,000. It is safe to say that at least $200,000,000 of that circulation is idle, that it is not in active operation; so that the actual volume of the circulating medium of the country at this moment is really but $560,000,000. Therefore the volume of circulation, notwithstanding our increased wants in the way of increase of population, in the way of increase of industry, of enterprise, the increased wants growing out of the abolition of negro slavery—notwithstanding our increased wants in all the respects to which I have adverted, the increase of the circulation is this day but a little more than one-third greater than what it was in 1860.

It seems to me that that is a strong argument in favor of the pending proposition to increase the currency so as to relieve the wants of the people. But we know that there is a very large concentration of the bank capital of the country in the Eastern States, and especially in New England. We know that that section of the Union has, in excess, of what was contemplated by law it should have, more than $80,000,000 of the bank circulation alone. Then there are circumstances, to which time will not permit me to advert now, which drive the great body of the currency of the country—and I think unnaturally—into that locality. Indeed, it would seem that the Government and everything else in the land is tributary to the Eastern States. Although they are non-producing of the raw material; although they are commercial and manufacturing; although the West and the South are the producing sections of the country, and the large majority of the population and the industry that make up the wealth of the country is located in those sections, still we find the greater volume of the currency concentrated in this comparatively small locality of the country.

Mr. ANTHONY. Do you call manufacturers non-producers?

Mr. MERRIMON. They are producers in one sense, but they are not the producers of the raw material, and their industry is only in aid of that industry which makes the raw material.

I am not going to quarrel with the Eastern States about the concentration of currency there. No one feels more kindly than I do to the Eastern States; no one is prouder of their industry and enterprise than I am; they are my countrymen, and I share in their glory, whatever it is. But the point I wish to make is that, notwithstanding that concentration of currency and capital in that locality, they have not to-day an excess of the amount of currency necessary to carry on their commercial and industrial transactions. We have been told that in New York money can be borrowed at 3 to 4 per cent. upon call. That very fact of itself is strong evidence that there is not too much money there. That is high interest for such a loan. If money but performs its legitimate functions, that would be fair interest for an ordinary loan. Then, again, I take it that with first-rate securities, securities as good as the money itself, a regular loan could be effected in Boston or in New York upon time at a rate of interest of from 7 to 10 per cent. Why, sir, that is a very high rate to pay for interest. That is too high a rate to pay for interest at a time when the currency of the country is in a normal condition, when there is sufficient of it to answer the purposes for which it is intended and ought to be used. All experience shows that 6 per cent. is a reasonable rate of interest; but a regular loan cannot be effected in New York or anywhere in the Eastern States at that reasonable rate of interest. So we see that, notwithstanding this concentration of currency in that locality, that particular locality has not too much. When it is proposed to withdraw it, and float it off to the West and the South, we find the bankers and the people there protesting against it, and they declare they have not more than they need. We not only hear from them, but we know that the manufactures of the New England States languish to-day. We know that some of the leading manufacturers there have become bankrupt for the want of currency to go on with business. We know that thousands and tens of thousands of laborers are starving for bread, and they are demanding labor. If there is a plethora there, if there is plenty of money, if there is a surplus, if there is redundancy, why in the name of common sense are these men not put to work, and thus set going again the regular industries of the country?

But, while we see this striking state of things in the Eastern States, what do we witness at the South and West? In the South, that section of the country which has been devastated by war, and which it seems to me the whole Union ought now to conspire to help build up, and develop, and set agoing again, we find a scarcity of money that is hardly endurable. The small amount of money that is there is loaned at from 1 to 1½ and 2 per cent. a month, and in many instances loaned at 25 per cent. We have been told by representative gentlemen from the West—and when I speak of the West, I confine that remark to that section of the country east of the Rocky Mountains—that the average rate of interest there is from 10 to 12 to 15 per cent. I submit that these arguments go to show that there is not a sufficient amount of money in the country to effect the legitimate exchanges. If there was, there would be plethora in the Eastern States; there would not be this great demand in the West and South for money. For I will advert here to a principle of political economy, that is as well established as any that my honorable friend from Missouri discussed yesterday; and that is, that money when it is in its legitimate channel, when it is effecting its legitimate purposes, as naturally seeks investment as water seeks a level. If there were plethora in the New England States, those people are a shrewd and enterprising people, men who know the value of a dollar, and how to use a dollar to make more dollars—if, I say, there were plethora there, as is contended, the surplus of money in that country would seek investment in the West and South, or somewhere.

Gentlemen have said that it would do no good to increase this bank circulation; that if it were increased the people of the South are impoverished and they have no money there with which to buy the bonds and to establish the banks; and the honorable Senator from Missouri said yesterday if they had the money to buy the bonds with, they have then to go to New York and buy them, and the money they expend in the enterprise of establishing banks they take to New York for the very bonds they are obliged to buy in order to set a bank going. I concede that the money would have to go to New York to buy the bonds; but, sir, if there were currency plethora in New York and in the Eastern States, as he contends, when this money is taken to New York to buy these bonds, immediately that money would go out to the West and go out to the South, in order to seek investment; if there was no legitimate use for it in New York or elsewhere, this would be the natural consequence. The money does not do so; and therefore I infer, and it seems to me the conclusion is inevitable, that it may be usefully and profitably employed in New York and other places in the East.

But the Senator says that the South particularly has been desolated by the war, and he expresses warm sympathy with her. I thank him for his sympathy; I only regret that he does not make it a little more practical at this time. But, sir, prostrate as the South is, there are immense resources there, the very best resources in this country. The Senator took my State to illustrate the position which he occupied and the condition of the South, and I will take it also to answer the purpose that I have in view just now.

In the first place, we have a climate and a soil unsurpassed, as I believe, by any in this highly blessed land. We have everything to invite industry and enterprise and investment. We have a population of a fraction over a million. The estimated value of our real estate is over $260,000,000. The annual productions of the State are over $60,000,000; and yet we are told that in North Carolina people owning that amount of property, that is as good as gold itself, cannot have a bank circulation of five or six millions, the amount that we had anterior to the late war. I do not believe that. I believe that if there were money in the Eastern States, if there were money in New York to lend that cannot be employed there, the capitalists who own it would desire investment; and they could not get a better investment than to go South and lend it to people there to encourage industry and enterprise, and take a mortgage upon their real estate. They could not have a better security. The same remark will apply not only to my State, but to every State in the South. Although the South is downtrodden, the population is there, the real estate is there, the personal property is there—these belong to them—that they can mortgage to secure any capitalist in the North who will go there and let them have money. Any one who will look at that country, any one acquainted with its resources, any one acquainted with the enterprise of those people, any one acquainted with their necessities for laboring as they never labored before, when we consider that the great crop of this country, that which produces more gold than any other in this country, is grown in the South, and can only be grown there, it must be manifest that the position that there is nothing there upon which to borrow capital goes for nothing.

I make these remarks for the purpose of showing that the present volume of currency is not what it ought to be. I believe that it ought to be increased, that it ought to be increased at least $100,000,000; the bank currency ought to be increased, as it seems to me, $46,000,000, and the $44,000,000 "reserve" of greenbacks ought to go out, and stay out, so that the gross volume of currency of the country shall be $850,000,000 at least. Then the volume of bank currency would be exactly equal to the volume of greenbacks. I know some gentlemen favor, if the currency is to be increased, the issue of more greenback currency. I would prefer it ordinarily; but under the present circumstances of the country I prefer this.

I prefer it, in the first place, because the proposition to increase it is so simple, that if the judgment of the Senate is in favor of an increase of the currency, it can give rise to no prolonged debate. If we discuss the propriety of abandoning the national banking system—and I am as anxious to get rid of it as anybody—if we discuss now the propriety of establishing a general system of finance for the country, to become permanent, the discussion will last the session out, and Congress will adjourn, giving the people no relief in that particular in which they demand it so vehemently from one end of the land to the other.

Then there is another reason in this line of view. If banks are stablished in the West and South the tendency is to localize capital. If a bank is there, and it lends the money every thirty, sixty, or ninety days, it must go back there, and the effect is to stimulate enterprise, industry, and all sorts of industrial pursuits in the locality where the bank is established. If the greenback currency is issued, those who speculate in the money of the country will get it, and we know where those speculators do congregate. They congregate in the great money center. It will then go to New York, and unless the currency of the country is so inflated as that there will become a great surplus there, not a dollar of it will go to the West or South. It will be used there in speculations in that locality.

But, sir, I did not rise for the purpose of entering into any general discussion of the subject before the Senate. I simply wanted to offer these considerations to show that there is a necessity for the increase of the present volume of paper currency in this country. I concur, I repeat, in many of the views expressed by the honorable Senator from Missouri yesterday, in reference to various questions of political economy; but I do not concur with him in reference to this question, to wit, whether we shall have an increase of the currency or not; and in view of what I have said, I desire to propound to the honorable Senator these two questions, and ask him to give the Senate a satisfactory reply to them; and if he shall fail to satisfy any one, I ask any Senator to answer them who can:

First, if what the Senator says is true, why does it not appear that there is an excess of currency in New England and the Eastern States in view of the acknowledged concentration of the currency there; and if there is excess or redundancy, why do prices not go up materially in those localities?

Secondly, if there is redundancy there, why does the currency in excess of reasonable demands fail to seek investment in the South and West, where it is admitted it is so much needed?

Mr. SCHURZ. As the Senator from North Carolina has put these questions in writing, he will permit me to look at them, and afterward reply to them, unless the Senator from Ohio, who intends to speak now, should in the course of his remarks reply to them.

Mr. MERRIMON. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to protract this debate; and if there was a disposition to vote now I would cheerfully give way. I am weary of this discussion, and I want to bring the Senate, if possible, back to the original proposition before us.

The pending question now is on a proposition to increase the bank paper money in this country $46,000,000. There is no proposition for its distribution among the States; there is no proposition that the South and West that have now less than their share shall have the whole of this; but it is simply an increase of the bank paper money of the United States. This is the first time since the close of the war that any man has had the boldness and temerity to propose an inflation of the currency. I wish to call the attention of Senators to this fact, that in the face of all the promises that have been made by political parties, in the face of promises made by the President of the United States, made by Congress, made by the very Senators who now are advocating this proposition, in the face of speeches without number made by these Senators to the people of the United States and as Senators here, this is the first time since the close of the war when a deliberate proposition has been made to add to the irredeemable paper money of the country.

I know that Senators forget and avoid this question. When we come to talk to them about inflating the paper money, they all deny it. The Senator who has just taken his seat [Mr. MERRIMON] says he is in favor of specie payments; the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] said yesterday he is in favor of specie payments; all of them say they are in favor of specie payments; and yet on this day, the 25th of February, 1874, nine years after the close of the war, they propose to add to the paper money of this country $46,000,000, without any plan of redemption, without any promise of redemption, without any hope of redemption. And this is all to relieve the country.

Mr. President, this proposition shocks me so much that I can scarcely discuss it; but let me take up and answer, if possible, some of the arguments by which it is plausibly maintained.

The Senator who has just taken his seat tells us that they want more paper money in the South; that they must have more paper money; that there is distress there. How will you get this paper money? What have you got to sell? Can you get it unless you have something to sell? What have you got to sell?

Mr. MERRIMON. Does the gentleman desire an answer?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. We had in the South a cotton crop that equaled last year nearly four million bales, worth nearly $375,000,000 in cash. We have in our State, as I said awhile ago, real and personal property worth $261,000,000, and our annual productions are equal to sixty millions; we have a population of over a million; we have a climate and soil unsurpassed by any upon this continent. We are in the condition of a man despoiled of his ready money, but who has the substrata which, if he can get ready money to carry into practical operation his ideas, will make him rich; and yet as we are we cannot use this vast amount of real and personal property in order to start again.

Mr. SHERMAN. I asked the Senator the simple question what they had to sell; and he tells me they have real estate, lands, &c. Their cotton crop is already sold for gold.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; the cotton crop in my State, as I understand from gentlemen there, is not half removed yet, and the crop of North Carolina is equal to about one hundred and eighty thousand bales.

Mr. SHERMAN. For every pound of cotton his people have they can get the market price either in gold or paper money without the slightest difficulty, and promptly. There is more paper money now in circulation than there has been at any time. The amount is actually swollen from twenty to thirty millions of dollars beyond what it was only last September; and yet he wants more paper money. Does he want to increase the price of that he has to buy and not to affect that he has to sell?

In all this debate, that which has struck me as the most remarkable is that Senators representing States whose products bring gold and who must sell them for gold, and the price of which is fixed in gold at Liverpool, the price of which is not affected by our currency in the slightest degree, should demand more paper money in order to pay higher prices for that which they buy, without affecting at all that which they sell.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator pardon me for making one suggestion at this point?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; but I did not intend to prolong my remarks, as I fear will be the result if I am interrupted. I will hear the Senator now.

Mr. MERRIMON. He suggests that we have no money in the South to take this bank stock. If we have no money in the South to take this bank stock, what harm will there be in passing the act so as to give us the opportunity to take it when we shall have something to take it with?

Mr. SHERMAN. Why, sir, the bill we reported does give you the opportunity you ask for. We propose to give to the South ample opportunity to organize all the banks they can. I have here for five years, at every session of Congress, demanded for the South and West the opportunity to charter and start local banks; and four years ago we carried a proposition which gave you an opportunity to take up to $54,000,000; and how much of that did you take? Very little. My honorable friend will see that even yet, according to the tables, North Carolina has a balance due her to make up her fair share of between four and five million dollars. I am in favor of his object, of giving his people the benefit of local banks, certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I say a word at this point?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MERRIMON. I trust I shall not be deemed discourteous.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. MERRIMON. I give the gentleman due credit for the sympathy and the zeal he has manifested in the direction he indicates; but with all respect to him, and all respect to other gentlemen who advocate his proposition I concur with the view expressed by the honorable Senator from Indiana, that, in the first place, that affords no relief whatever, and, in the next place, it is not just, because it is less than a half-way measure; and there is this, further: if the bill shall pass as it came from the Committee on Finance, I do not believe the South will get one dollar by way of redistribution; and why? The honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] the other day argued, and he made an able argument, to show that by the law as it existed at the time the Eastern States got this excess of bank capital, they had a right to demand it. If he is correct in that construction of the law, then if this bill shall pass and a New England banker should apply to me, if I were in the practice of the law here, I could in three hours get an injunction to restrain the Treasury from selling his bonds which he had deposited in the Treasury, and I could get up a litigation that would last for two years. I do not regard that proposition as amounting to anything. But I do give the honorable Senator credit for his zeal and his desire to benefit my section.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this is a kind of free and easy debate; and my friend thus far has consumed one-half my time, but I will stop now, abandon the line of argument with which I started, and show him how terribly he would be mistaken when he applied for his writ of injunction.

The act quoted by my honorable friend from Vermont, which authorized the old banks to get the preference in the distribution of this national-bank circulation, expired by its own terms on the 1st of July following its enactment. That provision of the law only was in force for four months, from the 4th of March, 1865, to the 1st of July, 1865; and after the expiration of the 1st of July $110,000,000 were issued to old banks without law and in defiance of law. My honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] will remember that the law which required the distribution to be upon the old basis, passed on the 3d of March, 1865, expressly provided that the circulation should be divided according to population and wealth. A law which passed on the same day gave a preference to the old State banks over new national banks, but that provision of law was limited to the 1st of July following; and so the old banks had no right whatever to any preference in the distribution of the share allotted to their State after the 1st of July, and yet after the 1st of July more than $110,000,000 were issued to old banks in open defiance of law.

Besides that, that law itself and all these banking laws contained the provision that Congress might at any time alter, amend, or repeal: and no bank now has a dollar of circulation which it holds by right. It holds it at the pleasure of the United States; and Congress might to-morrow, if they desired, withdraw from all the banks in existence their circulation and transfer it. It is all within the power of Congress.

Therefore, sir, when the honorable Senator says that this act, if passed, would not operate in their favor, he is not correct. No one disputes the power of Congress over this whole subject. The law of Congress is mandatory; and for them to say to us, as the Senator from Indiana did the other day, that the executive officers here would not enforce it, is to affirm that an executive officer dare disobey an open mandate of Congress. I say to the Senators from the South and West that, if they pass the bill reported by the committee, which authorizes at once the organization of banks in the Southern States, they will have the opportunity to organize them; and let an officer dare violate the law which requires him to withdraw the circulation from the New England States.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me, right there, to interpolate a word? He says that no executive officer dare violate this law. I ask him if the executive officers did not violate the law in issuing over $100,000,000 of circulation to the old banks at the time to which he just now referred?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask him, as chairman of the Committee on Finance, what he did with that officer?

Mr. SHERMAN. We had not anything to do with him. My honorable friend was then a member of the House of Representatives, and he had it in his power to file articles of impeachment against him, if he thought it necessary; but I always took it to be an honest discharge of duty. I had nothing to do with it. We could not act upon it here.

Mr. LOGAN. We offered articles of impeachment in one case, and did not care about coming in with any more. I will ask the Senator what right has he to say that an executive officer will not violate the law, that he dare not do it, when right in his face the law was violated, and stands violated to-day, and no remedy has ever been proposed?

Mr. SHERMAN. I ought to say, in justice to the gentleman who made this decision, that while I have always thought it was wrong, and from that day to this I have warred against it, I have no doubt that Mr. FREEMAN CLARKE, who was then Comptroller of the Currency, looking upon these laws together, construed that he had the power. I never thought he did right; but still, if there was a question of punishment, it was a matter for the House of Representatives to bring up.

But, sir, no one pretends, no one claims but what, if we do pass this bill now, it could be executed, and would be executed. The Comptroller of the Currency, the very officer who is called upon to do this duty, himself wrote this bill. He wrote it with the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and it was communicated to the committee officially, so that there is no question about the power, the right, the ability, and the willingness to carry this bill into execution.

Now I say again to the representatives from the South and West we are willing to give you the opportunity to organize all the banks under existing law that you desire, and to organize all that you are likely to organize. We say that in all human probability you cannot use more than twenty-five millions. We do not deny that if you can organize more than that, you ought to have more; but we say that in giving you a right which you ought to have, in securing that which the law gives you, in correcting an error that was made, you ought not to upset our whole financial system and open wide the flood-gates of more paper money. That is all we say.

Now, Mr. President, if the amendment now offered by the Senator from North Carolina is passed, what does it do? Is anybody benefited by it? Who? Forty-six millions of more bank paper money are issued. By what banks shall it be issued? I take it Senators expect it to be issued from the South and West; but there is nothing on the face of the proposition to indicate that.

Mr. MERRIMON. The proposition refers to the section contained in the act of March 3, 1865, which provides for the distribution to the South and West.

Mr. MORTON. The old laws making the apportionment are still in force.

Mr. SHERMAN. I supposed that was the design. Then this money can only be issued in the States that have not their proportion; it cannot be issued in the States that now have an excess. That was the purpose undoubtedly; and yet they tell us that they cannot issue but a very little of it in the South; they are not prepared to issue much. What good will be accomplished by it? What end will be achieved by it? Nothing but to unmoor our whole financial system. The South and West will not be benefited by this plan of gaining more local banks any more than they would be by the plan reported by the Committee on Finance, but our whole financial system is upset. The policy of inflation will be inaugurated. All the safeguards we have erected will be obliterated, all our promises violated, and we will have no power to resist new demands of paper money whenever a temporary stringency arises. It is the first step that costs. If we can but stand still we may reach a specie standard, but if we enlarge the limits of paper money we add enormously to the difficulty of resumption hereafter.

I wish now to come back to the point from which I was diverted by the Senator. I wish to show him how strongly we all are committed against inflation. I intend to quote largely from the Senator from Indiana, to show him how he is committed on this proposition of issuing more paper money.

In the first place, let me again call your attention to the sacred promise made by the act approved March 18, 1869, by which we declared that at the earliest practicable period Congress would make provision for the redemption of the United States notes in coin. How do you propose to fulfill that obligation? But I said enough on that subject when I opened this debate. Both political parties are pledged in the most sacred manner to do no act whatever that will carry us farther away from a specie standard. Does not every man see that the issue of more paper money will take us farther and farther from the road to specie payments?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not see it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then you announce the strangest opinions here that can enter the human mind. Here we now have $760,000,000 of paper money, irredeemable; more than Great Britain has; more than France has; more than Germany has. This paper money is depreciated; it is sold now at about eighty-seven cents on the dollar. You say that to add to that volume will not further depreciate it. Why, sir, you might as well say that to pour water on a pail that is full will not make the water overflow.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right there, because that is a point upon which I desire to ask him a question? Speaking about the resumption of specie payments, we have all heard that very frequently here——

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will ask me the question.

Mr. LOGAN. I will. I am only going to premise by saying that we who have opposed that have been denounced as inflationists. Now, I ask the Senator if he is in favor of an immediate resumption of specie payments?

Mr. SHERMAN. Is that exactly fair when the Senator rose only to ask me a question? I will come to that point after awhile. Does the Senator wish me to stop in the midst of the extracts I was about to read to ask me that question?

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. The Senator was talking about specie payments at that point, and I desired to ask him if he was in favor of it; for if he is I can show him a road that will do it to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. We will not dispute about that. I want to remind the Senator that he as well as the rest of us is committed by the same pledges, that we cannot violate here without being held up to public censure.

I have here the democratic platform of 1868 and the address of Governor Seymour as the candidate of the democratic party. Both affirm the duty of Congress to make our currency good as gold.

Mr. LOGAN. That is in both platforms.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; in both. So in the platform of two years ago the same declaration is made. Here is the Philadelphia platform of 1872:

> We denounce repudiation of the public debt in any form or disguise as a national crime. We confess with pride the reduction of the principal of the debt, of the rates of interest upon the balance, and confidently expect that our excellent national currency will be perfected by a speedy resumption of specie payments.

The democratic platform declares that—

> A speedy return to specie payments is demanded alike by the highest considerations of commercial morality and honest government.

These are the latest pledges of political faith by great parties.

But I want now to call the attention of the Senate to some extracts from a speech made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] a few years ago. The Senator from Indiana, who has been arraigning us who oppose inflation, introduced a bill on the 16th of December, 1868, "to provide for the redemption in coin of the United States notes and fractional currency, and requiring the national banks to redeem their notes in coin," on which he addressed the Senate. Here is the view he then took of paper money:

> It is impossible to calculate the aggregate loss to the country, even in one year, by this state of things, or to estimate the suffering and destitution produced by stagnation of business and the want of employment for labor; and it is not only the business, but the imperative duty, of Congress to address itself to the great work of reform, by adopting such legislation, if possible, whereby the currency shall be made good, and business be made to flow on prosperously through its regular channels. The business transactions of the country, amounting to many thousand million dollars in the course of the year, are conducted through the medium of the currency, and if the currency is depreciated, fluctuating, and deceptive, the prosperity of the country must inevitably be seriously injured and its general progress and development delayed. * * * * * *
> Why is our currency depreciated? And why would it be depreciated if the Government did not owe a single bond? Because the greenback note is a promise by the Government to pay so many dollars on demand, which it does not pay. The promise is daily broken, and has long been dishonored. The note draws no interest, and the Government has fixed no time when it will pay it. Under such circumstances the note must be depreciated. The solvency or ultimate ability of the promiser never kept overdue paper at par, and never will. To do that something more is required than the ultimate wealth or ability of the promiser. There must be certainty in the payment and time of payment, and if the time of payment be deferred, compensation must be made by the payment of interest. Let me suppose, by way of argument—

Here is a supposition that I would call the attention of the Senate to.

> Let me suppose, by way of argument, that A. T. Stewart, the great merchant in New York, should pay off his numerous employés in due-bills or notes payable on demand, which draw no interest, and which he refuses to pay on demand, and will fix no time when he will. Notwithstanding his immense wealth and his entire ability to pay, his notes would inevitably depreciate, and could only be sold at a large discount, which would be increased if it were admitted that there was no legal remedy by which he could be compelled to pay them. One of the wealthiest men in the Northwest, now dead, who left some $5,000,000 to be divided among his heirs, had an unfortunate habit of refusing to pay his small debts. Instead of paying he would give his notes for them, refuse to pay the notes at maturity, suffer himself to be sued, then hire a lawyer to fight the cases. The result was that his paper was hawked about the streets at 60 or 70 cents on the dollar, while perhaps that of his near neighbor, who kept a small store and was only worth $10,000, but who was prompt in the payment of his debts, could be sold at a very small discount.—Congressional Globe, part 1, third session Fortieth Congress, 1868–'69, p. 102.

This was what the Senator from Indiana thought in 1868 about a depreciated paper money. He compared the condition of the Government of the United States to the case of Mr. Stewart issuing his notes and then refusing to pay them, and to some miserly man out West, whom he did not name, who not only issued his notes whenever he could get anybody to take them, but then contested and fought their payment. That was undoubtedly a true description of the effect of depreciated paper money. Every word that the Senator said was perfectly true; and that is just the condition of the same money now. Here we have $380,000,000 of just this kind of paper money so graphically described by the Senator from Indiana—paper money that is overdue, owed by the United States, and which ought to be paid, which ought to be made as good as gold; but we refuse to pay it. We have said that we would pay it; we have said that we would pay it at the earliest practicable moment. Our wealth is overflowing. The United States, that owes this $380,000,000, has property to the amount of $32,000,000,000, and yet it will not fulfill its promise. It will not take any step in that direction. Although we have agreed to do it, not a single step do we take; but, on the contrary, we now propose to issue forty-six millions more of another kind of paper money, payable in our broken promises. Is not that strange? Is not that the spectacle that is now presented? Here is our paper, just exactly the kind described so well by the Senator from Indiana, floating at large, depreciated below its standard, no effort made to raise it, no additional value given to it by allowing it to be converted into bonds, or in any way. There it is. And now we propose to allow capitalists who hold bonds to go and file those bonds in a safe place, issue 90 per cent. of the amount of those bonds in bank-bills payable in this very depreciated money so well described by the Senator from Indiana, and yet he now says that such increase will not depreciate the money more. Sir, how fallacious this is. Any addition to the volume will depreciate the value; and if A. T. Stewart, whose case again I will take, after he had arrived at that condition when he had refused to pay his notes, although he had the means, should add more to them, would it not more and more depreciate them? Suppose the miser in the West, described by the Senator from Indiana, after he had shown his disposition to contest an honest claim, should add to the volume of his notes thus contested, would it not tend more and more to depreciate them? Suppose he had shown, for five years, not only an unwillingness to pay, but an ability to put off the time of payment indefinitely, I ask would not that still more depreciate them? And then suppose some third person should propose to issue notes payable in that kind of depreciated paper, what would be the effect of it?

Here I come to a point on which I was surprised to hear the view of my friend from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] whose intelligence and ability I fairly concede. He tells us that the issuing of $46,000,000 more of paper money, bank-bills, payable alone in greenbacks, will not tend to depreciate the greenbacks, and will not take us further and further from the road to specie payments. Why, sir, the addition of $46,000,000 of bank-notes to the volume of our currency has almost, not precisely, but nearly the same effect as the addition of $46,000,000 of greenbacks.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator claim that the difference between gold and greenbacks is wholly owing to a redundant currency, to the fact that the volume is too large? Is that the sole reason for the difference between the price of greenbacks and gold?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is the sole reason. The currency falls below the value of gold because it is not convertible into gold. I have argued over and over again that in my judgment we can at times maintain a larger circulation in this country upon a specie basis, even, than we have now; but it must be convertible into gold at the pleasure of the holder. The fact that we have this paper which is dishonored, which is now in the open market sold below par, that we refuse it for custom duties, that we refuse to receive and take in payment of bonds, that we ourselves dishonor and refuse to say when and under what circumstances we will pay it, but add to its volume, such paper money will inevitably continue to depreciate more and more as the amount increases and confidence in its redemption in coin diminishes.

Mr. ALLISON. Will not much depend on what we may do with the excess of greenback circulation, the difference between $356,000,000 and the $381,000,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. Therefore other elements enter into the calculation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought my friend had some way of escape. If my friend will join in retiring an equal amount of greenbacks, then we are all right, and I suppose that is the solution. I agree that that would advance us toward specie payments. If we should issue $46,000,000 of bank currency and at the same moment and by the same bill provide for the retirement of $46,000,000 of greenbacks, then we should be on the road to specie payments, and a rapid road; and if that is the position of my honorable friend from Iowa I most heartily welcome him, and I do not differ with him in the least.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state my position before I vote on this question. I only desire now to put one inquiry. I understood the Senator to say that the issue of forty-six millions of national-bank notes would, per se, increase the difference in price between greenbacks and gold. I maintain that that does not follow.

Mr. SHERMAN. Unless it is accompanied by a proposition which retires a different kind of paper money. Undoubtedly I speak of an increase. The Senators are talking about an increase of paper money. That is what they want. The Senator from North Carolina is appealing for an increase of paper money. The Senator from Indiana is appealing for an increase of paper money, although he says he only wants a moderate increase. My friend from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] wants an increase to eight hundred millions, four hundred of each kind. I say that either of these propositions or anything that tends to increase the volume of paper money, undoubtedly tends to depreciate the value of the mass. The proposition may be stated arithmetically in this way: If $700,000,000 of gold will buy the outstanding currency of $780,000,000, and you add to the $780,000,000 $100,000,000 more of paper money of the same kind, the $880,000,000 will not buy any more cotton, corn, or other produce than the $700,000,000 of gold; that is, any addition to the amount necessarily depreciates the purchasable power in precisely the same ratio. You cannot get around it. I suppose it is out of fashion now to quote books and authorities recognized as such, but that is the plain common sense of the thing.

Why, sir, money, whether gold or paper, when unduly increased, has the effect of raising the price of everything. Money and property and productions are relative terms. Whenever there is more money than is necessary to be used in the ordinary daily exchanges of life, the inevitable effect is to advance the prices of commodities. And, sir, the only way by which you can tell the value of paper money, and whether it is redundant, is whether that paper money will buy less of any commodity than gold or silver. Whenever paper money will buy less than gold or silver, then it is redundant; and it either ought to be retired or new employments be given to it.

Something is said about the amount of paper money in this country, and Senators say we want more currency. Well, sir, I am willing to say I wish we had more currency; but what kind of currency? We want good money; money that is tested by the standard recognized by all nations. When you say to me that there is a dearth of money, that there is more money wanted down South, I am willing that they should have all the money that is necessary to buy their commodities at par with gold.

The honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] in a carefully prepared speech that he made a day or two after I had spoken, went into an elaborate calculation to show that in the aggregate France had more money than we had, and perhaps that some other countries had more than the United States, although I believe he did not affirm this as to any except France. What does that prove? When you come to compare the amount of our paper money with the amount of paper money in France, we find that we have in this country $760,000,000 of paper money; we find they have in France $520,000,000 of paper money; we find they have in England $230,000,000 of paper money. But the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] says there is $200,000,000 of our paper money lying idle as reserves. Well, sir, it is so in England. The reserves of the Bank of England alone are over $100,000,000. The reserves of the Bank of France are 760,000,000 francs, or more than $150,000,000. The reserves in all European countries are always greater than in ours. The amount of paper money actually in circulation to-day in this country is greater than in France and England combined.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to say a word at this point, inasmuch as he has referred to me?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. My calculation on this question was induced by the statement of the Senator himself. He said this country had more money than any country in the world. I then went to work to examine into that matter to see whether that statement was true or not, and I found that he was mistaken.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not mistaken; but the Senator can go on.

Mr. LOGAN. I therefore made the calculation. The assertion was in reference to money, not paper money, and it is true; and he will find to-day by an examination of the statistics that France has more money than we have, and so have the other countries to which I alluded just as I stated.

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon this point, since the Senator and I spoke upon it, there has been very full evidence collected by Mr. Young, the head of the Bureau of Statistics; and after examining all the figures, if it is at all material, I am prepared to prove and to show, by what I regard as good authority, that taking the aggregate of our gold and of our paper money, we have more money in this country than they have in France, which is about equal to us in population, and considerably more than any other nation. But, sir, that is not material. The point I want to get at is, and that is conceded by the Senator from Illinois, that we have more paper money in this country than any two nations of Europe. In France their paper money is as good as gold. In England their paper money is as good as gold. In the United States our paper money is at a discount of 13 per cent.

Why is this? It is because we have too much of it. But it is said they have more gold than we have, and therefore more money. But why is this? It is because we discard gold as the standard of value, and therefore banish it from among us. We expel it as bullion to pay for silks and satins. If we would learn wisdom from the example of those great nations, we would decrease our paper money and increase our gold money, and blend and mingle them into a common currency, the paper always equal to gold.

The fact that we have more paper money than either of these two countries, in proportion to gold, is a conclusive argument that if the amount of our paper money was reduced to about the proportion of their paper money ours would be at par with gold. We produce gold in this country. We could rapidly accumulate gold. Gold is here "native, to the manner born." We have an annual production of $75,000,000 of gold and silver. How long would it be necessary for us to accumulate in order to obtain sufficient gold to maintain resumption? As our paper money is depreciated below par in gold, while paper money is at par in gold in other countries, the true remedy is not by adding to the volume of this paper money, but by taking from the volume, and reducing the amount until we reach the par in gold. The very moment our paper money is brought down to the standard of gold, then gold enters into circulation; gold forms a part of our ordinary currency; the volume of our currency is swollen more than it was before, and the beauty of it is that our currency then would be good anywhere and everywhere, at home and abroad, and not be a falsehood written on its face.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a word at this point?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. In regard to the point that the Senator makes about the paper money in France being at par, I agree that whenever this country is in the condition of France, our paper money will be at par, and I should be very glad to see it. Whenever we have more gold and silver in the country than we have paper, then it will be at par, and when we have an equal amount, or probably when we do not come to an equal amount, it will be at par; but the conditions are different.

The Senator says we may accumulate gold, and I desire to make an answer to that right here. The production of gold in the world, according to the statistics, cannot exceed $100,000,000 annually. Twenty-five million dollars of that it is estimated go into art and manufactures, and $75,000,000 are used in coinage and bullion. The estimates made in reference to this country are that the travelers from America to Europe expend from sixty to seventy-five millions of gold per annum. That amount is taken from this country merely by travelers to Europe. Then we pay in addition to Europe over sixty millions of gold per annum as interest. That makes over one hundred millions of gold drained from this country every year. Now I ask the Senator how is he going to accumulate gold to put us in the condition of France until the balance of trade is in our favor?

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon that question of the balance of trade I said enough the other day, I think, to satisfy my purpose, though probably it may not satisfy the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely asked how we shall accumulate the gold. I have stated the proposition as established by the statistics of different countries, and I presume the Senator will not dispute them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Without answering that long question now, I prefer to go on and read some more instructive information from the speech of my honorable friend from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] It is so much better expressed than I can express the same ideas, that I hope he will pardon me if I make use of his speech to a considerable extent to answer some of the arguments that he has made at a later date.

> If the Government did not owe a single bond, the value of our currency could not be improved except by making arrangements to redeem it; and if the Government does make arrangements to redeem it, the existence of the bonded debt will not prevent the improvement in its value.

That is very true. Our notes are not depreciated because we owe a large debt, because everybody knows we can pay it. Our notes are depreciated because we do not pay them; and if every dollar of our bonded debt was paid, the greenbacks would not rise in value until we took some steps toward paying them.

Now, upon the ground of morality, I wish to read what my honorable friend said as to our present currency:

> The proposal to improve our currency by taking our surplus gold and investing it in bonds would be regarded by capitalists as absurd. The gold thus paid out would not enter into the circulation, but would sink back into an article of merchandise, to be gambled for, as it now is, in Wall street. What would the world think of the morality of such an operation? We have $356,000,000 of the public debt overdue and drawing no interest, and we take the only means of paying this debt and apply it to the purchase, at a discount, of our bonds, which will not be due under fourteen years. What would be said of the integrity of the man who should refuse to pay his debts which are due, leaving his creditors to suffer great loss, and should employ his money to buy up at a heavy shave his debts that will not be due under ten or fifteen years? Plain people would call such a man rascal and swindler, and would speak of the Government in the same terms under the same circumstances. The pretense that it was done to improve the value of the currency would deceive nobody. Such a plan of returning to specie payments is worthy of the circumlocution office, and should be labeled "How not to do it."

How remarkably pertinent that is to this occasion! And yet with $356,000,000 outstanding still, and $24,000,000 piled on to that, with $54,000,000 of bank-notes issued since that time, added to $300,000,000 bank currency then outstanding, with $20,000,000 added to our fractional currency, and now a proposition pending to add $46,000,000 more, we are told this will not depreciate or change the value of the currency or reduce its purchasing power; that it is all honest, fair, and square, and that the Government is justified in doing it. My friend's argument, it seems to me, is too strong to be overcome even by his subsequent speeches. But let us go a little further:

> The greenback currency is a part of the public debt, for the redemption of which the faith of the nation is solemnly pledged.

I think but for the fact that I made my speech since the Senator made this one I could have said that he quoted from me, but I must have quoted from him unconsciously:

> The redemption of this pledge is not only demanded by every principle of national honor, but is imperatively demanded by the interests of the people, collectively and individually. The currency of a country lies at the foundation of its daily business and vitally affects the interest of every class and condition of people, and if the Government, overlooking its honor and its duty, should take the only means by which it can be improved and apply it to the purchase of bonds which will not be due for many years, it would merit and receive the indignation and contempt of honest men everywhere.

Mr. SCHURZ. Is not that about the argument I made yesterday?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is rather more strongly stated. Here is another statement made by the Senator from Indiana:

> In regard to the redemption of these notes, it has never been a question of ability but of purpose; and to say that these notes cannot be paid until the general credit of the Government is improved by the expenditure of some hundreds of millions in the purchase of bonds that will not be due for years, is to fly into the face of common sense and insult the intelligence of the people.

Thank fortune, Mr. President, since this language was uttered we have paid nearly $400,000,000 of these bonds and have not paid one single dollar of these notes; so that if the argument was true then, how much stronger is it now!

> But one thing is certain, that while nobody doubts the ability of the Government to pay the notes by making reasonable preparations, if the Government neglects or abandons the currency, under whatever pretense or disguise, and applies its surplus revenues to the purchase of bonds, with a view to improve the value of the rest of them, and thus legislate for the benefit of a class—the only class in this country doing well enough, and better than any other—the currency will sink from that hour, and the very foundations of good faith will be shaken. Such legislation would be notoriously and wickedly partial and unjust. What would be thought of a great railroad corporation that should refuse to pay its overdue floating debt, and apply its current revenues to the liquidation of its long bonds, under the pretense that it would thereby improve its ability to pay its floating debt? But such legislation would be as stupid as it would be wicked, for the depressed currency would inevitably carry down the bonds in its close embrace. While our overdue paper, drawing no interest, and for which no time of payment is fixed, and no preparation made, must necessarily be depreciated as it now is, still that depreciation would be far greater but for the general faith existing among the people that the Government will speedily make arrangements for its redemption. When this faith is broken, the currency will sink lower, and sink rapidly.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator from Ohio made an allusion to me in regard to the volume of currency.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was some time ago. I want to get through with this point now.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. When the Senator closes, then, I should like to compare views with the honorable Senator, the chairman of the committee, on the point as to the volume of currency.

Mr. SHERMAN. After awhile; we shall have plenty of time.

Now, Mr. President, in view of the fact that my honorable friend from Indiana in 1868 was so very anxious not to appreciate the bonds at the expense of greenbacks, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the spectacle now presented. The amendment proposed, the title of which, if passed, should be "A bill to depreciate greenbacks and appreciate bonds," adds to the volume of the circulation $46,000,000, and it makes a market for bonds already above par in gold to the amount of over $50,000,000. Now, what is the effect of making a market for these bonds? Before any of these notes can be issued, the new banks must buy the bonds. The 6 per cent. bonds are worth 118 in currency, and the various bonds required by this bill are worth from 113 to 118, and here you make a market for them, you make a demand for them, because before this bill could be utilized they must buy bonds. The effect of that is to appreciate bonds, to make them higher and higher and higher, and to depreciate the greenbacks. You add $46,000,000 to the volume of currency, thus lowering the one, and make a market for $50,000,000 of bonds, thus raising the other, and you make the difference that is now disgraceful to this country between bonds and notes more and more for the benefit of the bondholder. The argument then made by the Senator from Indiana is very strong and very true.

The idea is now held out that this is for the benefit of the poor, to make money easy, to pay laborers, to start machinery, to start improvements of various kinds and furnish labor to the people. There never was a greater deception than this, by which you cheat the laboring man by giving him for his labor paper the purchasing power of which is growing less and less day by day. You pay a man two dollars for his day's work, and every day by adding to the amount of that currency, without any plan of redemption, you depreciate its purchasing power. You add to the value of the gold, which is the money of the capitalist, and of the bonds which are held by the capitalist, while every day, in slow and almost imperceptible degrees, you take food from the man who earns it by his daily labor, or that which purchases food.

I am not through yet with the speech of the Senator from Indiana. He made such a strong speech, and said so many good things in 1868, when he was on the other side of the question, and stated the argument so much better than I can, that I will read a little further. He said:

Suppose the greenback currency was contracted down to $100,000,000, could the remaining hundred millions be brought to par in any other way than by making arrangements to redeem it?

You cannot pay a debt without paying it, and every trick or device to bring the currency up to par, without making preparations to redeem it according to the promise on its face, will be abortive and disastrous. The currency is depreciated because it is overdue and dishonored, draws no interest, and there is no time fixed or preparation made for its redemption; and these causes would depreciate it if there were but $100,000,000 of it afloat. The effort to force depreciated and irredeemable paper up to par by making it scarce and pinching the people is like an attempt to enhance the price of unwholesome provisions by producing a famine.

Mr. MORTON. Does the Senator indorse that statement?

Mr. SHERMAN. Which statement?

Mr. MORTON. The one you have just read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will read it again:

The effort to force depreciated and irredeemable paper up to par by making it scarce and pinching the people is like an attempt to enhance the price of unwholesome provisions by producing a famine.

I do not know but that I can indorse that; but I am in favor of allowing the holder of the greenback to have what is equivalent to gold and siver coin for it, if that is what the Senator means.

Mr. MORTON. No; the Senator advanced the proposition a month or six weeks ago that you could bring the greenbacks to par by the simple method of contraction.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did say that it could be done, but did not say that I was in favor of it. The Senator knows I do not favor contraction, but rather to give new value to the greenback by authorizing its conversion into bonds.

Mr. MORTON. You read approvingly what I said. I said that could not be done; and I say so now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am undoubtedly in favor, without diminishing the volume of our greenbacks, of advancing the whole to par in gold by various measures that have been proposed; but I will not discuss them now.

Now let us look at what the remedies proposed by the Senator were:

First. By establishing the period of redemption a fixed value is given to the greenback note.

His proposition was to fix a day when we would resume specie payments without a contraction of the currency.

Now its gold value is fluctuating and deceptive, sometimes varying as much as 10 per cent. in sixty days, and scarcely ever remaining the same for a week at a time.

That is very true; and it is a remarkable fact that the greenback has varied within the last twelve months more than the entire depreciation of the greenback to-day.

But by fixing a time for its redemption a certain value is given to it. If the note is to be paid in gold on the 1st of July, 1871, its value can be determined by the ordinary rules of discount, and will steadily improve as the time for its redemption approaches; and other preparations being properly made, it will be at par on or before the day fixed for redemption by gradual appreciation. By fixing the time of redemption one chief element in the value of all commercial paper is gained, that of certainty in the time of payment.

Second. By fixing the period of redemption the country is notified and may be prepared for the change. People will have it in view in making new contracts and arrangements in business; and debtors, fearing a decline in the prices of property, will make haste to pay their debts.

I have many other passages of this speech marked, but I have read enough to show that the arguments presented by the Senator from Indiana are entirely inconsistent; not in harmony at all with the position taken by him a little while ago. Remember that to the positions taken by him then the country was solemnly committed. The very year this speech was made was the year when the political parties convened in national convention, and made their declarations that they would take every proper step toward specie payments; and Congress committed the people of the United States to it at the very next session of Congress. Now, for the first time since the close of the war, the proposition is made to abandon that policy, to turn our backs upon it, to go in the other direction, and increase the volume of our paper money, and leave far behind us the standard of gold and silver.

The worst of it all is, that Senators take that which I have always cherished as among the proudest recollections of my public life, the organization of the national banking system, and make that system the camel to bear the burden of inflation. Sir, I can show you now, by a reference to the congressional debates at the time the banking bill was passed, that the banking bill was passed as a means for specie payments. It was the design to bring about specie payments at the close of the war by the national banking system. The bank bill was first proposed by Governor Chase, in 1862, but was not then adopted by Congress. In the session of 1862-'63 it was taken up, and after a debate of something like two weeks in the Senate it was finally passed and sent to the House of Representatives; and was there passed, without amendment, under the previous question. The only debate upon the bill in its first passage was here in the Senate, which lasted about two weeks. I could quote copious extracts from that debate, among the rest from my own speeches and from the speeches of Judge Collamer, Mr. Fessenden, the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] and others, to show that the purpose, the chief object, the benefit to be derived from the banking system was that it was to be the mode, the road, to specie payments. By no one was that more strongly stated than by the Senator from Wisconsin. At the time the first banking bill was passed greenbacks were convertible into bonds; and it was said then that at the close of the war, as bonds advanced to par with gold the greenbacks would be converted into bonds; and then these national-bank notes would take the place of the old-fashioned gold-paying bills. That was the intention. When this bank bill passed, any holder of greenbacks might present them to be converted into a five-twenty bond. Unfortunately, after the bank bill passed, that provision was suspended, and finally repealed, and there crept in the error which finally defeated the whole object of the system.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I want to call the attention of the Senate to a remarkable inconsistency—not occurring in six years, but occurring in less than ten minutes—between the Senator's argument just now and his argument a little while ago. His argument was that an increase of $46,000,000 of national-bank notes, although they were required to be redeemed in greenbacks, and the volume of greenbacks was not diminished, would have the effect to depreciate the value of the greenbacks and of the whole body of the currency. Now he tells us that the national-bank notes were created for the express purpose of bringing the greenbacks to par and returning to specie payments; that the issue of one, two, or three hundred millions in national-bank notes was not thought then to have the effect of depreciating the greenbacks, but to enhance the value of greenbacks. How? By making a demand for bonds, and by making a demand for the legal-tender notes for reserve.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator with a good deal of ingenuity has thrust a speech into my remarks; but it is a very small mole-hill.

Why, sir, we expected that these bank-notes would advance to par in gold by the retirement of the greenbacks; and I will read the Senator a passage to show that that was the expectation, and if he will only agree to that there will be no trouble at all about the matter. A proposition was made to require these bank-notes to be paid in coin. In reply to that I said:

In regard to the other objection, Congress fixes what is lawful money. Congress may at any time change the law, and change the standard and make it gold and silver. I have not the slightest doubt the very moment our bonds are worth par in gold, that moment specie payments will be resumed under the operations of this bill. That is the practical working of it, and it cannot be avoided.

Under the law, as it then stood, the holder of greenbacks could convert them into five-twenty bonds; and it is a remarkable fact that within one year after the close of the war the five-twenty bonds did reach par in gold; so that if that provision had been left in the law as it was when I made this argument, every dollar of our paper money would now be at par in gold.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should like to ask the chairman a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather finish this extract first.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It is right on that point.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will wait until I get through reading the extract:

The very moment our 6 per cent. bonds are worth par in gold and silver, that moment the United States currency, as it is called, will be converted into bonds as a matter of course; the United States notes will be retired; and then these banks will make specie payments. As long as the war continues, experience has shown that no bank, no nation, can make specie payments.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not insisting on that during the war.

Mr. SHERMAN. The very moment peace is restored, and the bonds are at par, at that moment specie payments will be resumed. If Congress wishes to hasten the time, it may change the law in regard to what is lawful money; it may declare gold and silver the lawful money; and then, by the provisions of this bill, these notes must be redeemed in gold and silver. There is no doubt about that.

That was the original foundation of this national banking policy. I say to the Senate that the national banking bill never would have passed either House of Congress but for the expectation that the national banks themselves would be the means, shortly after the war was over, to bring us to the specie standard. Why, sir, during the whole war, while my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] was fighting the enemy in the field, both Houses of Congress were carefully limiting the extent of paper money. In the Senate especially we acted as the conservative power of the Government and carefully limited the amount of paper money. We never issued any without providing some means for its retirement. We carefully restrained it; and in the national banking act we provided a means by which, if the law had remained as it was, we would have surely and safely returned to specie payments.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to interrupt the Senator at that point. If I understand the portion of the remarks that he delivered at that time, it was, that by passing a law making gold and silver the only legal tender, we should thereby arrive at specie payments through the national banks. Is not that the idea?

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply said that the greenbacks then, under the provisions of the law, would be converted into bonds; and then, as a matter of course, there would be nothing to redeem with but gold and silver, and that would be specie resumption.

Mr. LOGAN. In that connection I will ask the Senator a question, carrying out the idea of the question that I asked him when he first commenced his argument, whether he was in favor of immediate resumption. If gentlemen are in favor of an immediate resumption of specie payments, is not the shortest road to it to repeal the legal-tender act, and would not that perform the same office that redemption would under the former theory? There would be nothing then a legal tender but gold and silver, and then we should be on a specie basis. The only question then would be whether we had the specie or not. I would not agree to it; but I only put that proposition. If Senators are in earnest and desire specie payment at once, could they not arrive at it at once by a repeal of the legal-tender act? Then, if the country is able to maintain it, you have specie payment; if not, you do not. I do not think the country is prepared for it; but if you are in earnest about it, that is the shortest way to it in my judgment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will speak of that after awhile. I desire to call the attention of the Senate now to another matter. Some reference has been made to the law of 1870; and I have traced the history of that law, and I have found that every member of Congress, including my honorable friend from Indiana, most zealously declared in 1870 that they would not do any act that looked like inflation. In 1870 we had this controversy about the distribution of bank circulation. The Committee on Finance reported a bill to provide for $45,000,000 for banks to be organized in the South and West, just as we have done at this session; and we provided then, in order to prevent a contraction or inflation of the currency, that the 3 per cent. certificates then outstanding should be retired with the $45,000,000. The Senator from Indiana insisted that by issuing $45,000,000 of bank currency and retiring $45,000,000 of 3 per cent. certificates we actually contracted the currency $7,500,000; on this ground, that as the banks had to maintain a reserve, it required $54,000,000 of bank-notes to equal in its effect upon the currency $45,000,000 of greenbacks, or 3 per cent. certificates, which were demand notes and the same as greenbacks; and the Senate yielded to him, the Senator from Indiana declaring that he would not at all propose any measure that looked toward inflation. He said he had always been opposed to inflation. That proposition was finally adopted. Then, in order to provide for the possibility of more being needed in the South and West, they put in this provision about the $25,000,000, the last clause of which was penned by the Senator himself; and it is that clause, words written in his own hand at that desk, which created the very difficulty we are now trying to remedy. My honorable friend, if he will look over that debate, will find that he declared that while he was opposed to contraction he was equally opposed to inflation, and he was opposed to any increase of bank paper money one dollar beyond the amount then fixed by law; but he said that in order to keep the balance equal between contraction and inflation, instead of the forty-five millions reported by the committee we ought to have fifty-four; and after some argument, I believe, I finally agreed that there was some plausibility in it, that as 15 per cent. of the amount of bank-notes had to be kept in the vaults of the banks as reserve, there was a reason why $9,000,000 more should be added to the $45,000,000; and so the law passed. Then, instead of going forward, he himself proposed to transfer from New England to the West $25,000,000 more, on the ground that the $54,000,000 would not be enough to reach Indiana in sufficient quantity, and therefore he demanded $25,000,000 more; and finally that was carried, and is now the law of the land. The only reason why this has not been executed is because it was so narrowly limited and so narrowly restrained, and so worded as to be declared to be impracticable.

Now, the only object of this bill, which it has taken one month to discuss, was to carry into execution a defective law penned by my honorable friend from Indiana; and yet the effort is to pile on this bill, the object of which is so plain and just—even if the amount was increased to $50,000,000 it would be perfectly right—to pile on it the question of inflation, the increase of the volume of bank paper, money, which that Senator declared in 1871, he would not consider, which he opposed only two years before by an argument of great force, a proposition which every political party in this country has declared against, which the Congress of the United States has declared against, and which the President of the United States is committed against in every annual message he has sent to Congress. What will be the result of such a policy? To derange values, to disturb the business of the people of this country.

Sir, you may think that this measure is a small matter; that this will not disturb values. Why is it that the business men of this country send you their urgent appeals? Why is it that petitions come from the chambers of commerce not only of the East, but of the West? I can see that the popular ad captandum argument of more money, unless examined and analyzed, is one that is taking before a crowd. Going to an ordinary popular assemblage, I have no doubt the people would shout for more money; but when these same people examine the question, study it, and hear both sides and give it their "sober second thought," the second thought which brings a jury almost always to an accurate conclusion—when they hear both sides, the people of this country will be just as much opposed to all these schemes of inflation as the business men of the country have shown themselves to be.

Sir, I do not say that the measure now proposed by the honorable Senator from North Carolina is as wild and bad a measure as some that have been proposed. I know that the process of organizing banks in the South and West will go on slowly. I know there are difficulties in the way. Perhaps the immediate effect of that measure will not be so great as even those who are opposed to inflation fear. But I do say it is turning our backs upon our record in the past, upon our promises in the past—opening up the door to inflation. And, sir, when a future demand comes, when tight times come, somebody is in debt, somebody cannot carry on his magnificent schemes of improvement and enterprise, and he comes here and demands relief, then another call will be made for more paper money; then the cry of my honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] for $100,000,000 will be heard, and will carry; then there will be no road out of this irredeemable paper money except through bankruptcy and repudiation.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Will the Senator allow me one word?

Mr. SHERMAN. Excuse me; I would rather get through.

Mr. President, it is only because I see and feel these things that I stand here to oppose it. There are modes by which we can get back to specie payments—not suddenly, as my friend from Illinois says. We are not disposed to go into any rash, harsh, and severe measure looking toward specie payments. I do not know a Senator on this floor who would propose an immediate resumption of specie payments. My honorable friend from Illinois, at the very beginning of my remarks, wanted to thrust upon me the question as to how. Well, Mr. President, I believe that we shall have accomplished a great result, the winning of a battle, worth as much to us as any battle throughout the late war, if we can resist this cry for more paper money and stand where we are. From the time I came to this Congress, feeling in the air that spirit which sprang out of the panic, I felt that there was great danger that Congress would go back of all its promises and embark us in a wild sea of paper money in order to give immediate relief. Time has passed; time has had its healing influence. Many of the evils that existed when we met in December have disappeared; many of the fears then existing have been dissipated; and now, with money overflowing in all the centers of business, and gradually spreading itself over the country, with more money in circulation than we have ever had before, with increased facilities, with a lower rate of interest, now after three months have dissipated many of the fears of those who have gone before us, now to embark on this sea of paper money would be a crime as well as a blunder. That is the way I look upon it.

But the Senator asks, "What is your plan for getting back to specie payments?" Well, sir, if there was no other plan, I would say with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] "Stand still," and we shall see the glory of the Lord after awhile. It will be a long time hence, I fear; and that is the trouble. If the Senate would go a little further; if the Senate would provide for the retirement of so much of the $44,000,000 as has been issued, either by the sale of bonds or in any way that can be agreed on—and if its issue be permitted at all, it should be established as a permanent, fixed reserve, not to be used except for exigencies prescribed by law; and it ought never to be used but in a great emergency, and then not under the mere discretionary power of the Secretary of the Treasury—that of itself would be a measure in the right direction; but I am in favor of going still further. I do not expect all Senators to agree with me. I believe that now is the golden moment to fix a time when every dollar of our broken promises shall be made as good as gold. He wanted it done in 1871. I should like to see it done in 1875 or 1876, or any time. Let us fix a time in the future which a majority of the Senate can agree upon, and say that at that time, say the 1st of January next, we will redeem our broken promises either in bonds or gold. There is no practical difficulty about it.

My honorable friend from Massachusetts, who made a speech the other day, made the only argument that has ever given me any trouble on this whole question; and that is, "What shall be the condition of affairs between now and the 1st of January? Will not the fluctuation of 10 or 12 per cent. between the present standard of paper money and the gold standard produce ruin, contraction, and distress?" The only answer is that we have had a fluctuation of values of more than that amount every year since the close of the war; and sometimes it has gone as far as 20 or 30 per cent., and yet no ruin or great distress has come from this fluctuation. Business becomes adapted to it.

Fix a day in the future—that was the argument of my friend from Indiana—and people will grow to it; they will gradually advance to it; money will go on investing in its ordinary channels, and people will be prepared; and when the day comes no man will care whether he receives gold or bonds when the greenback is payable in either. Sir, it will be the old story over again. If we only have confidence in the people, confidence that they are as wise as we are, and fix a day when we will make our promise good, there will be no difficulty. Why is it that I prefer a redemption in gold? My honorable friend from Indiana seems to think that is a very terrible proposition, to redeem in bonds. He says, "Why, you promised gold, and you will only pay bonds." I think we shall do the note-holders a great deal of good if we give them that which is a great deal better than the note now, and which is nearly at par in gold. The reason I prefer redemption in bonds as a step in the right direction is because we could issue these bonds without being at the enormous expense of maintaining in the Treasury a great pile of gold. But redemption in bonds is only a preliminary step. In my judgment, it would be the final step; because when you have by this measure raised your notes up to the standard of the bond, the bond itself is so near the standard of gold that things which are equal to the same will be equal to each other; and they will assimilate and pass from hand to hand. It may be that a few of these notes would be converted into bonds. If so, they could be issued for current expenses and thus avoid making a loan now threatened; or they could be used in the purchase or payment of the public debt. But I am not wedded to any theory; I want to take some step in the right direction.

If we can only stand still and prevent the inflation of paper money, that is one step. Again, if we can go back to where we were before the panic, we have gained much. I solemnly believe, after the most careful examination, that every dollar of that money issued over three hundred and fifty-six millions was issued without authority of law. I examined that question in the closet, carefully, deliberately. I have never heard anything to change my opinions. I know there is an honest difference of opinion about it. I do not wish to thrust my opinion on others. I should like to see the volume of our greenbacks reduced to the standard where it was before the panic. Then, if it is necessary to legislate about the reserve to enable the Treasury to meet an exigency, we can provide for it; but we need not do it now.

In this way we can easily approach specie payments, and then you may have free banking; but free banking without resumption is only an addition to the volume of paper money. Free banking can only exist upon the basis of redemption, and a prompt and hearty redemption. I would not only be in favor of redeeming in coin—first in greenbacks, and as greenbacks approach to par in gold, in coin—but I would also make, not only centers of redemption, but I would make one common redemption, and provide modes by which the bank paper money might flow back regularly, periodically, according to the necessities and the demands of trade and commerce, to be redeemed, and then again to be issued, as more money was needed from time to time. That only is banking. It is not banking when you issue your note to pay and never pay it, never fix a time when you will pay it, and do nothing to prepare for payment. That is the issue of inconvertible money. Free banking is a machine by which paper money can for a time be substituted for real money, flow out, and be returned again to its source, performing the functions of currency, to move the crops, to make exchanges. The only mode by which the amount of this paper money or this real money can be established at is the amount that can be maintained at par in gold.

Now, Mr. President, my opinion is still that the Senate ought to go back to the original proposition in the bill before it, and pass it. If the members from the South and West, who have a majority here, think twenty-five millions is not enough, they have the power to increase it, and Senators from the Eastern States who are here will feel the justice of their taking whatever is necessary to equalize the currency. There is no reason in the world why each section should not have an opportunity to start local banks. I know that my friends from New England have said, "It makes no difference; the money will flow back again; if you take money from Rhode Island and remove it to the West it will flow back again." So the currency will flow back, but the advantage is in local banks. A local bank is a little center of business. It furnishes facilities. A local bank is more likely to loan money to the merchants and traders of the neighborhood and give neighborhood facilities. And, sir, you weaken your national banking system when you do not allow that. The national banking system never could have passed but for this provision about distribution. I find, upon looking up the records of the history of the national banks, that this provision about distribution was not in the original bank act sent to us from the Treasury Department. The Committee on Finance made a great many amendments, and among the rest this very provision was inserted; and when the amendment as to distribution was brought up, after a little conversational debate, it was adopted unanimously, every Senator feeling that there must be some mode of distributing this currency locally throughout the country. That was the origin of it in the law of 1863. It was dropped in the compilation of 1864, merely because up to that time only $60,000,000 of bank capital had been taken, and it was not thought worth while to renew it. But the next year, when we found that the old banks were rushing into this system, when we found there was danger of inequality, we by the act of March 3, 1865, restored that provision. Up to that time there had been no less than $100,000,000 of banking capital under the national system, so that when we restored the provision about the distribution there were still two hundred millions of circulation not taken. On the same date a provision was suddenly put into an internal-revenue bill, about midnight, by an amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, without discussion or debate, and when that was put in it only provided to give old banks the priority for four months from that time, until the 1st of July. It did not provide for a repeal or change of the general provision about distribution. After the 1st of July, 1865, $110,000,000 were issued up to the 1st of October, 1865. If Senators will look at the official documents, only $160,000,000 of paper money had issued, and the limit was $300,000,000; so that after that $110,000,000 were issued.

I say, therefore, whether it is injurious to the West or East, the North or the South, here is a matter of plain justice, a stumbling-block in the way of the Committee on Finance. We want to correct it as far as we can. While we thought it was not necessary to go to the whole extent of a full and complete redistribution of bank circulation, we thought the measure was a wise one to be considered by itself, just as the subject was considered in 1870. We therefore reported it. If Senators think that $125,000,000 is not enough, they can make it more, and then pass it; and thus we still have got this stumbling-block out of the way.

If you adopt, on the other hand, the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, you will leave the local sore festering. Issue $46,000,000 more, and you will have the same question here again in two or three years; because if you swell the volume, by issuing $46,000,000 to the South and West, they will not have their share, and they will demand again that this old inequality shall be corrected, as they have demanded it every year, year by year. If you increase by $46,000,000 now, giving it to the South and West, you will leave this local sore, and thus you open wide the door of expansion and the question of inflation. You alarm men. Already under the fear that in some way or other your paper money will be diluted, gold is advancing. Pass the bill with this provision, and what will be the effect of it? The money-changers of New York will measure your laws precisely as they measure ingots. If they see that your measures tend to depreciate the value of your money, they will measure it at their estimate. They fix the value of your money; we have not the power to do it. You may pass all the laws you please, and if you pass any law that swells the volume of your currency or makes you turn your back on the promise of the faith of the nation to make the note as good as gold, you will depreciate your currency, and the depreciation will be measured by the bulls and bears of Wall street. If, on the other hand, you only stand where you are, according to the view of the Senator from Massachusetts, but especially if you take any decided step that looks toward the redemption of our broken promise, that moment the bulls and bears of Wall street will advance your credit in the money market of the world, because after all gold is the par; greenbacks are daily measured by their daily depreciation. No, sir, I assure the Senator from North Carolina that his proposition will do the people he represents no good, but, by unfastening the moorings to which we have been tied, it will do great evil, and therefore I am opposed to it. Go back to the original proposition.

Now, sir, a word in regard to the effect of this upon the New England States. I could read here a statement made by one of the ablest of New England's moneyed men to show that this withdrawal of $25,000,000 from the New England States will be scarcely an appreciable thing there. My honorable friend from Rhode Island the other day stated the effect of it. This does not reduce their capital; it does not affect the organization of a single bank in all the United States. It simply provides that banks which have over $300,000 circulation shall be required to retire from time to time as needed a certain proportion of it. What is the mode in which that is done? Some Senators think that is going to prevent these banks making discounts and carrying on their ordinary business. Not at all. I have conversed not only with the Comptroller of the Currency, but with bankers affected by it. What is the effect? The Comptroller will call on a bank for, say $10,000 of its notes, to be surrendered at a certain time; and under the law he can give them thirty days. Suppose they are not surrendered, as they probably will not be able to surrender them, then the Comptroller of the Currency will order $10,000 of the bonds of the United States belonging to that particular bank to be sold in the market, and with the money thus received he will retire greenbacks; he will buy in $10,000 of greenbacks and retire them.

Then the provisions of the bill require that all sub-treasurers, all the Government depositories, banks, &c., shall assort the bills of this particular bank until $10,000 of them are found, and then this $10,000 of bills will be retired and the greenbacks issued again. But before this operation goes on, to prevent the possibility or fear of contraction, this is not to go on until after the new notes are issued. So that when new banks are organized, and one or two millions of new bank-notes are to be issued, then commences the process of redistribution. There may thus be for a little while, perhaps for thirty days, a temporary increase of the circulation until this process can go on. That is all. This will go on slowly, because these assessments on the banks to be affected will be made probably every month. Whenever $1,000,000 of fresh banking capital is authorized in the West and South, requisitions will be made on these Eastern banks. The list of banks is given. It is before the Comptroller. He can say how much—1, 2, 3, or 4 per cent.—is necessary, and he makes a printed requisition on the banks in excess, and the whole thing is done. All there is of it is to transfer the profits of this circulation from the East to the West and South; to give to the West and South an opportunity to organize banks; to give them local facilities; and it does not affect the capital, the deposits, the business discounts, or the bills receivable of any bank in the United States. All that it affects is the amount of the bonds deposited by them as security for circulation. And I say to you, after the most careful deliberation, feeling the responsibility for this proposition, that this will not create the slightest shade of disturbance; it will only take from banks that by an unwise decision have received more than their share a portion of their circulation and transfer it to banks organized in the South and West, without any disturbance whatever of the business of the country.

In this way you can remove this sore; and I appeal to Senators from the New England States, who have heard this thing cast in their teeth, why not do it? I said to them that Ohio did not care much about it, nor should Indiana. Indiana has already got very nearly her share, and is entitled to no more unless you swell the volume. So with Ohio. I say it is far better, even if there is to be an increase of bank circulation, that this inequality of distribution shall be removed from the politics of our country.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me right there? The Senator has made a remark, the importance of which I think he scarcely appreciates in this argument. He says that Indiana has nearly her share of the three hundred and fifty-four millions. So she has; but Indiana has not nearly what she needs to meet her local wants, and by the distribution of the three hundred and fifty-four millions she cannot get it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will not lead me off from my argument. I was about closing when the Senator thrust in a remark that Indiana has not got enough. No State has got enough irredeemable money. Why, sir, if you give the banks the opportunity to issue irredeemable money on the deposit of bonds, you can swell the amount to $1,500,000,000.

Mr. MORTON. That is an evasion. I was speaking about the local wants of the State, where banks in some cases are forty miles distant, and we cannot get them under the $354,000,000. You must enlarge it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will tell the Senator the remedy. Let us join in some plan looking toward the redemption of the greenbacks. Read the speech of 1868 over again, and then let us proclaim free banking. There is no trouble about it; the people of this country can have all the money of the world. We can try the question as to how much paper money can be kept in circulation in this country if we will only go toward specie payments or specie redemption. Then the people of Indiana can circulate all they want, as long as they can maintain it at the standard of the United States bonds or at par with gold. We will give them all the benefits of circulation. That is the remedy.

My friend wants to accomplish one thing—the organization of local banks—forgetting that the accomplishment of that result would derange the whole business of the country and introduce another element into this matter. So far as the redistribution is concerned, I have always agreed to it. Senators from the East may not feel that this thing of a local disadvantage thrown into our teeth in political times is one that cannot be answered, when eastern men come, as Governor Seymour did from New York, and travel all over our western country and tell us that New England had got the advantage of us in this circulation, and intended to hold on to it, although New York also had the advantage; and in Cleveland, in his speech in 1868, he actually made that the basis of his indictment against the republican party. Why, sir, we cannot stand it. It is not right; it is not fair. Whether we want the circulation or not is not a matter that we will now debate. What we want is equality; what the law gives us, what the law promised us; and although I do not believe that these banks will be organized to anything like the amount that the law would give us, yet the right to organize them should be conceded. If the people do want to organize them in any part of the West and South, the opportunity ought to be yielded frankly. And I say to Senators representing the New England States that the actual effect of it will scarcely be perceptible; and I should be willing to leave this question to the practical, sagacious, and well-instructed mind of my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] This whole operation could be carried on without any disturbance.

Now, sir, I say had we not better take this measure? Here we have spent one month—not wasted, I know, because we have discussed questions that will come up again—but we have spent one month in debating other matters than the bill before us. I want to call the Senate back to the proposition that is before us. The Committee on Finance have gone over all these questions time and time again, and we felt that on one proposition we could stand united. Although in that committee all sections of the country are represented and all shades of opinion are represented on this question of inflation, we could stand united upon the fact that the law, now not carried into execution on account of some defective criticism, shall be carried out; that these $25,000,000 shall be provided in order to equalize the circulation, and if necessary to add to it. That we could agree upon. When that is disposed of, then the question as to how far we will go toward specie payments and how fast; whether we will do anything; whether we will adopt the advice of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, or whether we will go a little further, can be considered. I think he will agree with me that we ought to provide for the retirement of the $44,000,000 reserve. Although I have never conversed with him about it, I hope he will agree with me on that. We can do that much toward specie payments. Then, if we may agree on some steps further in that direction, we shall have come to a happy solution.

But, sir, I cannot take my seat without for the last time expressing my almost terror that the people of the United States—a proud, rich, free people of forty millions, pledged in every way, by President, by Congress, by local resolutions—should turn their back in this time of peace and prosperity upon the promises they have so often made. I do not believe they will do it. Time alone will punish those who now suggest it.

Mr. ALLISON obtained the floor.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me a single moment?

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] put two questions to me which, when he pronounced them, I did not clearly understand; and as he put them in writing, he was kind enough to hand them to me. I wish now to reply to them.

The first question is, "If what the Senator says is true, then why does it not appear that there is an excess of currency in New England and the Eastern States in view of the acknowledged concentration of the currency of the country there; and if there is an excess or redundancy, why do not prices go up in those localities?"

The fact is that the eastern money centers are glutted at the present moment with money; and if the Senator will take the trouble to read the market reports he will be convinced that they are. And as to the rise of prices, it appears to me that prices are actually rising. Stocks have gone up very much. They have gone up beyond the point at which they stood before the crisis. Gold has gone up also, and general commodities are doing the same. That is the answer to the first question.

The second question was, "If there is redundancy there, why does the currency in excess of a reasonable demand fail to seek investment in the South and West where, it is admitted, it is so much needed?"

As appears from the market reports in the western business centers, there is an abundance of currency also; and as far as the currency which is now in the eastern markets seeking investment in the West and South is concerned, I think that would be so but for two circumstances. In the first place those who hold it in the eastern markets may think that they can more profitably employ it there; and in the second place there is a want of confidence, not in the honesty of southern or western people, but in the general stability of business at the present moment; and it seems to me that for that reason money does does not go to the West and South seeking for investment. That is my answer to this question.

But, being on my feet, if the Senator from Iowa will indulge me, I should like to make one remark in reply to the speech made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] yesterday. I tried to interrupt him at one point, but he declined to yield, which, I think, in our intercourse I have never done. But still he may have had good reason for it. The Senator from Ohio to-day exposed some remarkable inconsistencies in the course of the Senator from Indiana on this question. Yesterday, when I pronounced opinions different from those of the Senator from Indiana, that gentleman put the "foreigner" at me, alluding to the fact of my having been born on foreign soil, and concluding that I did not understand this country. I will not inquire whether this was in good taste or not, but I would merely say that I remember the time when I, with others, helped to promote the political interests of the Senator from Indiana, and those who thought like him did not look upon me as a foreigner at all then, and they thought that I understood this country admirably well. But as soon as I happened to differ with his views, he at once discovered that I was not born in this country and do not know anything of its affairs. I think it would be just as well for the foreign-born constituents of the Senator from Indiana to understand that as long as they agree with him he recognizes their full rights of American citizenship, but as soon as they dare to differ with him in politics he will at once let them know that they are foreigners and had better hold their tongues.

I must observe in the same connection that to agree always with the Senator from Indiana is a little difficult. It is not easy to keep up with him in the movements of his opinions, for I believe there is no public man in existence to-day who has been so frequently on both sides of a question as the Senator from Indiana. Taking this matter of currency alone, he was a fierce specie-payment man not very long ago. Had I been for inflation then, as he is now, he would have said of me that I was a foreigner, and did not understand the affairs of this country. Now he has gone through all the phases and shades and forms and grades of inflation, until finally he has landed where we see him; and I being a specie-payment man, he says I do not understand the affairs of this country, because I am for specie payments, as he was not long ago.

I repeat, sir, that as much as I would like to be recognized as a full-fledged American citizen by the Senator from Indiana, I cannot purchase that honor at the price of following him in all his changes of opinion.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I have said but little in this debate, and do not intend to occupy time now, only to say a word in defense of my vote for increase of bank circulation, in view of the criticism just made upon that vote by the honorable chairman of Finance. But before speaking of the effect of increase of bank circulation to the extent of forty-six millions, a word in reply to what has just been said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] with reference to the accumulation of currency in New York.

When the national banking act was passed, its provisions were such as to induce accumulations of money at money centers, so as to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate loans, and the act therefore, had a twofold purpose: first, to float the bonds of the United States; and, secondly, to aid the Government in restoring specie payments at the close of the war, or as soon after as it could be safely done without destroying the business interests of the country. These provisions, intended to make the circulation flow to the money centers at recurring intervals, are still in force, and I regret that the committee having charge of this subject have not proposed modifications of the banking act in these respects, and thus check speculation, particularly in New York, whence the tide flows at certain seasons of the year. We all know that in the spring and summer, under the machinery of this act, money goes to New York, and instead of being loaned on commercial paper is loaned on call, because it is uncertain when the country banks will draw their balances for the purpose of moving the crops and for the legitimate business of the country.

It is in a measure true, as stated by the Senator from Ohio, that the price of gold is affected by what financial measures we may pass. It is also true that although we have been told for two months here that Congress would inflate the currency, and although several days ago the Senate instructed the Finance Committee to increase the bank circulation, the price of gold to-day is substantially what it was two weeks ago, and has only advanced some 2 per cent. in two months. It is only 12½ or 12⅝ to-day, and has been in that neighborhood for many days.

I inquired of the Senator if, in his judgment, the difference between gold and United States notes was wholly owing to an excess in the volume of the currency. I understand his answer to be in the affirmative, and his whole argument is based upon this assumption, as was the argument of the Senator from Missouri yesterday. I do not think this can be shown, and yet it is the basis upon which the argument against any proposed increase of bank circulation must rest. There are many elements that enter into this difference. I will not now discuss them, but will say that I do not believe the proposed increase will advance the price of gold.

We have many times increased largely the volume of the United States notes without such effect. Very recently we have increased the volume of greenbacks to the extent of $26,000,000 without much effect on the gold market, as gold to-day is only about 1½ or 2 per cent. higher than when the increase began, and other things have also contributed to this advance of price.

Mr. SCHURZ. It has gone up over 6 per cent. from the lowest point.

Mr. ALLISON. Since the 1st of November?

Mr. SCHURZ. Not since the 1st of November.

Mr. ALLISON. I trust the Senator will not quote the price of gold in New York during the season of the panic, when nothing could be sold, when the boards were practically closed, and all classes were hoarding gold, greenbacks, and national-bank notes. I allude to the price of gold after business was partially restored at the beginning and during the month of November.

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator will permit me, gold, at the beginning of November, I think, was about 7 or 8 per cent. premium.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not remember the price at the beginning of November.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think it was 7 or 8 per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. I have in my desk a statement of the price of gold during November, I will not take the time to recur to it. But I am sure it was as high as 10½ per cent. premium by the middle of November, and if I mistake not it was about that figure in December. But I only called attention to the fact that although very recently we have had added to the greenback circulation, which we all know is the character of issue that affects the price of gold, to the extent of $26,000,000, we have had an advance of the premium only from 1½ to 2 per cent. This advance was also stimulated and induced by the fact that it has been stated on this floor and in some of the prominent newspapers that a majority of Congress was in favor of a large inflation of paper money, and also by the fact that at the end of the year we are likely to have a large deficit in the Treasury as compared with one year ago.

Several times we have had large fluctuations in the volume of paper money without affecting the price of gold.

These fluctuations often occur on a specie basis in other countries. The Bank of England, on a specie basis, has several times largely contracted and expanded its issues, without disturbing the business or affecting values materially.

The Bank of England and the country banks of England, after the act of 1819, did not materially reduce their circulation, but resumed specie payments a year in advance of the time fixed on a large volume of circulation; which volume was increased until it reached almost the highest figure in 1826.

I do not think, therefore, it is at all safe to say that the gold premium to-day measures the excess in volume of our paper money. That premium is dependent upon many other and equally important elements, in my judgment; some of which were well stated yesterday by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] I do not believe therefore that the proposed increase will materially affect values. I should hesitate long before I would vote for a measure which would suddenly, or at any time, have the effect to materially change the relation of debtor and creditor, or suddenly increase or diminish the normal values of thirty-two thousand millions of property. If we would have permanent prosperity we must have stability of laws and of values.

As I believe a sudden diminution of the paper currency of the country, now or at any time, would destroy the business interests of the country, and involve all in bankruptcy and ruin, so I believe that a large and rapid increase of paper currency would increase prices of commodities and induce speculation, which in turn would prove equally disastrous. I do not believe this measure would have any such effect.

The Senator from Ohio has often told us that the South and West would require at least two years to absorb $25,000,000 of bank circulation. If that be true it will take three years at least to take up the $46,000,000; so that it would be taken up at the rate of about $15,000,000 per annum. It has taken four years to absorb the $54,000,000 provided for by the act of 1870.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Iowa understands very well that the whole of the $26,000,000 to which he has referred, and more, has been accumulated in the banks of New York, and now lies there idle. I desire to ask the Senator whether he believes, if it was the faith of the banks or of the community that this $26,000,000 and the whole $44,000,000 of the so-called reserve were to remain permanently in circulation, it would not affect prices more than 2 per cent., and whether gold would not go up more than 2 per cent. if that was the conviction of the public.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a pretty long question. The banks in New York at their last statement had about $20,000,000 of greenbacks in excess of their reserves. They usually have a large surplus; I believe at this season of the year above the amount required by law. This $26,000,000, as business requires, will flow out of New York and go into general circulation as heretofore. It has already had its effect upon the price of gold, and I think the general belief is that this $26,000,000 will not be materially affected by any legislation we may propose here one way or the other. But I am not considering the effect that this $26,000,000 has, except as it illustrates what I say as to the price of gold. We all know that an increase of bank circulation redeemed in greenbacks is a very different thing from an increase of legal-tender notes. But I do not believe that this $26,000,000 if left in circulation will very much enhance the price of gold; that advance has been made already.

All the arguments against increase of bank circulation assume that we now have excessive issues of paper money. I think this an error.

On the 4th February, 1868, we restricted by law the legal-tenders to $356,000,000, unless the provision as to the reserve, so called, authorized an increase. Thus six years ago we placed a limit on the circulation, which has not been enlarged since the $54,000,000 of additional bank circulation, taking the place of the 3 per cent. certificates, which were counted as currency by the banks. During this interval we have had an unprecedented growth in every part of the country. We have been expanding rapidly in every avenue of business and industry from that time until the present, or until the panic of September last year. A single illustration will show the vast growth of which I speak. We have added to our postal service in that time twenty-five thousand miles of new railway, opening up new localities requiring a large amount of additional circulation as compared with 1868. Can it be said that we have just enough now, and that any addition will increase the price of commodities and change the relation of debtor and creditor?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would ask my friend whether, in the last four years, it has not been considered that the policy of the country would lead us to specie payments, and whether that has not been the theory on which we have been acting?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly that has been the theory, and no one that I know of proposes to change that theory, unless the Senator's theory of converting legal-tenders into bonds would have that effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me ask this, then: Suppose we increase the volume of currency as we increase in population, should we not lose the benefit of that gradual appreciation?

Mr. ALLISON. If we should increase the volume of the Government paper to a large extent, I agree that that would be the effect of it. If we had a total issue of five or six hundred millions of United States notes to pay, I have no doubt that that would be the effect. But an increase of bank circulation is a different thing from increasing the issue of irredeemable paper notes by the Government of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there any difference between issuing greenbacks and notes which are payable only in greenbacks? I cannot see it.

Mr. ALLISON. I can see a vast difference. The measure of gold depends on the volume of greenbacks, because they, for the time being, represent gold as compared with national-bank notes; and I think there is much weight in the argument made by the Chicago Tribune, read yesterday by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] that you might increase the national-bank notes without limit, and as long as they were redeemed in greenbacks, and the volume of the greenbacks remained the same, it would not increase the price of gold. And I believe that the Senator from Missouri in his argument yesterday almost became a convert to free banking, because I understood him to state that if some amendments were made to the banking law he did not know but that he might vote for free banking. I am not willing to go so far. I am not willing to enter on any experiment that will involve a large increase of the circulating medium. I desire to stand as nearly as we can upon the existing circulation, having due regard to the increased wants of certain portions of the country now without banking facilities. I believe the proposed increase is required by the growing wants of business in the South and West as an inducement to carry there and localize bank capital with the profits on circulation enjoyed by other sections of the country. Therefore I voted for the $46,000,000. I have no fear that it will unsettle values or retard specie payments, when specie payments become possible. But if free banking would not increase the gold premium, the greenback circulation remaining the same, how can the addition of only $46,000,000 do it?

I shall be ready in good time to vote for free banking, and am ready now, with a limit placed on the circulation.

But we who vote for this increase of the circulating medium of the national banks are charged with a violation of the spirit of the resolve of 1869. I stand for that resolve to-day as I did then. I voted for it then in the other House. I am in favor of a return to specie payments at the earliest practicable period. We all know that we cannot return to specie payments now, or make positive provisions for such return at this time.

We know that we can only get back to specie payments by one of two methods. One is a contraction of the greenback currency, and the other is waiting until the exchanges of the country and the business of the country will bring the greenbacks up to gold. We can legislate in that direction in various ways, but the country is not prepared for it. The Senator from Ohio says that we have disgraced the greenback. When did we first disgrace the greenback? If at all, we did it by the act of 1870, and never before. By the refunding act of 1870 for the first time in our loan laws we provided that gold only should be received in payment for loans. By every act prior to that time, by the act of March 3, 1865; by the act of April 12, 1866, which the Senator from Ohio, in his speech made some time ago, declared to be in violation of the spirit of the promise of the Government with reference to the legal-tender notes—by each and all these acts we provided that the greenbacks should be taken at par for interest-bearing bonds of the United States, and it never was inserted in any law that greenbacks should be disgraced or placed below par until the refunding act of 1870 which provided that gold alone should be taken. So that the greenback has thus far, with that single exception, been cared for by our legislation. We have done nothing to discredit or disgrace it; and we only increase the office or function or purpose of this greenback when we increase the bank circulation.

Mr. BAYARD. Will my friend from Iowa permit me to refresh his historical recollection of the discredit first put by the United States upon their own paper money? It was when they declared that gold alone should be received for duties upon imports. That was the discrimination, and the first, which I think was in 1862.

Mr. ALLISON. I of course did not mean to include that provision; but the great body of our greenback circulation was provided for after the act of 1862 was passed.

Mr. BAYARD. O, no; the first discredit to the Treasury notes of the United States Government was in declaring that while they should be a legal tender for all debts, public and private, they should not be received in payment for duties on imports.

Mr. ALLISON. I believe the same act that provided for the issue of $150,000,000 of United States notes originally also provided for a large loan, the amount of which I do not remember, and also pledged the duties on imports for the payment of the interest and as a sinking fund for the ultimate redemption of the debt.

Mr. SHERMAN. The act of February 25, 1862, provided not only for the greenbacks, but for loans, and also for gold payment.

Mr. BAYARD. There were three general acts providing for the issue of Treasury notes known as greenbacks; and every one of those acts discriminated against the note by declaring that while it should be a legal tender for all other debts, public and private, it should not be receivable for public duties on imports.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree to that. Therefore to that extent the greenback never was placed, or intended to be placed, upon a par with gold until after the war we should have again resumed specie payments.

Mr. MORTON. That was its original character.

Mr. ALLISON. That was the original character of the greenback, as the Senator from Indiana very properly says. What I mean to say is, that there was no act disgracing the greenback until 1870. You cannot say that the act of 1863, which simply provided that the greenback should not be converted into a 6 per cent. bond, was really disgracing the greenback; because at that time, and ever afterward up to 1870, we always provided that the greenback should be taken at par for loans; and that was one of the pledges made in reference to it, that it should always be receivable at par for loans made by the United States. Yet the fact is—and I only speak of this now in order to call attention to the fact—that we have been legislating for the bonds, not for the greenbacks, these last six years. We were not willing that the bondholder should take at least partial chances with us on the greenback note; but we provided in our refunding act of 1870 that gold alone should be taken for the loan of 1870.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to remind the Senator from Iowa that the act of 1870 did not properly touch the quality of greenbacks at all. The object of the law was to raise means with which to redeem outstanding bonds bearing a higher rate of interest, and we sold 5 per cent. bonds at par payable in coin, and with that coin we redeemed the outstanding 6 per cent. bonds. Therefore that act, in my opinion, did not in any sense touch the character of greenbacks or affect them one way or the other. It was not so designed; I think it had no such effect; and I respectfully submit to the Senator from Iowa that it cannot properly be quoted either in exaltation or derogation of the policy of the Government in that particular.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree with the Senator that we said nothing about the greenbacks in the act of 1870. I only say that that was the first loan act in which we introduced a distinction between greenbacks and gold with reference to the public loans; and if the Senator states that we are bound by that resolution of 1869——

Mr. SHERMAN. The act of April 12, 1866, first introduced it; and then, in 1868, when we stopped the contraction of the currency, we practically stopped the conversion. The act of 1866 was the first.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not agree with the Senator as to the effect of the act of 1866. That act distinctly recognized the right to convert the United States notes into any of the bonds authorized by the act of 1865.

Mr. SHERMAN. It limited the power to destroy them to the amount of four millions a month.

Mr. ALLISON. It limited the power to destroy to four millions a month, namely, he could not reduce the then existing volume more rapidly than four millions a month. The real object of the act of 1866 was to include the funding of non-interest-bearing obligations as well as interest-bearing obligations.

But in all these acts we allowed the greenbacks to be taken at par for the interest-bearing bonds, if we had a loan to place on the market up to the act of 1870; and I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that that act was simply a refunding act, to convert a 6 per cent. bond into a 5 per cent. bond; and I only introduced it here for the purpose of showing that while we are severely criticised for not complying with the spirit of the act of 1869, pledging the faith of the Government to make the greenbacks equal to par, the Senators who introduced and voted for the proposition called the refunding act of 1870, also, for the first time, introduced a provision by which the greenbacks were excluded from the United States loans, and that the effect of that exclusion was to depreciate the greenback. That is all I meant to say.

Now, Mr. President, I have said really more than I intended to say when I rose. I should not have spoken at all but for the fact that the Senator from Ohio charged me, among others, with voting for an inflation of the currency by the issue of irredeemable paper money in such manner and in such method as will affect values in this country. I insist that the effect of this additional issue of $46,000,000 will not be as suggested by the Senator; and no better argument could be made to show it than the very fact that during these past two or three weeks the price of gold in New York has maintained itself practically at the same rate, notwithstanding it has been understood that there would be an increase of bank circulation. When we come to the discussion of an increase of the greenback currency we will approach a very different question and a very different proposition, on which I do not now express a conviction.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, for some time I have been tired of this discussion, and should not have taken part in it but for the fact that there seems to have been a purpose on the part of several Senators that I should. Yesterday the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] made his speech personal to me, and he was about as offensive in his matter and in his manner as he could make it to be parliamentary. It drew forth some reply; and to-day my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has had occcasion to review what I have said heretofore upon this subject, with a view of placing me in an inconsistent position. I submit that the effort of my friend from Ohio has not been an unqualified success. I have not changed my view of the character of the greenback. I think I can defy him to point out any word I have said this whole winter contradicting in the least what I said in 1868 in regard to the character of the greenback and the obligation of the Government. I have changed my views somewhat in regard to the feasibility of a speedy return to specie payments, and perhaps as to the time at which it should be attempted. In 1870 I thought that the fifty-four millions would be sufficient then, with the twenty-five millions, to give to the West and the South all the currency they required. But I know now, as we all know, that it came very far short, and that more currency is required in the West and in the South to equalize the distribution and to meet the wants of those sections. If that is inconsistency, I freely confess to it; but my inconsistency goes no further; and although the Senator from Missouri said I had entirely changed, he cannot show it, nor can anybody else, further than the matters that I have pointed out.

While my opinions have had some occasion to undergo a change in regard to economic questions—and I have changed my views several times in the course of my life on important questions, but have been, I think, consistent in the main, always endeavoring to be right, and always endeavoring to do right—while I may have had occasion to change my views in regard to the expediency or the feasibility of returning to specie payments in a given time, I think my friend from Ohio has also had occasion to do the same thing, and that his departure has been more extensive than mine. While my friend was reading from my record, he forgot that he had one. He smiles now because he remembers it. I will refresh his recollection. My friend has changed his views upon several very important matters in connection with our finances, particularly in reference to the right of the Government to employ the original greenbacks in the payment of the five-twenty bonds. The first argument that I ever read in favor of that unqualified right and power on the part of the Government was made by the Senator from Ohio; it was before I was a member of this body. I was entirely convinced at that time, and I am yet; but my friend changed his mind.

In 1868, being a very young Senator, and comparatively inexperienced in legislation, I had the temerity to bring forward in this body a plan for returning to specie payments. It provided in effect that the Government should reserve the surplus gold, instead of selling it, until such time as a sufficient quantity had been accumulated to justify us in beginning the redemption of the legal-tender notes in coin; not redeeming them in a bond, another paper promise, but redeeming them in what we originally promised to redeem them in, coin. I put the time off nearly three years, I believe, from the period when I first brought forward my proposition, to give the Government time to acquire the gold and the country to prepare for it. At the time when I brought forward my proposition I think the premium on gold was about thirty-four cents on the dollar. Now I think it is about eleven. But my friend from Ohio at that time thought it would not do at all to fix a time for resuming specie payments, and that to make a change of 34 per cent. in the value of the currency in something less than three years would bring about general disaster, bankruptcy, and ruin, and break up nearly everybody in the country. Last winter my friend brought forward a bill from his committee authorizing the funding of the greenbacks into 5 per cent. bonds, which are at par in gold, and that conversion was to take place on the 1st day of January, 1874, about ten months from the time he brought the bill forward. He said the effect of it would be at once to bring the greenbacks to par, to make them equal to gold, which would make a change of 11 per cent. in their value in about ten months' time. He himself has brought forward a bill, without the authority of the committee, this winter, to the same effect, to convert the greenbacks into 5 per cent. bonds on the 1st of January, 1875, and that bill is now on our table. My friend opposed my plan, because, he said, it would not do to fix any time for a return to specie payments; that that must come about gradually; it must work out its own salvation; that to fix a time for resumption would be attended with the most dreadful results.

Now I will ask the Secretary to read the passage that I have marked, and we will see what a change the views of my friend have undergone on that subject. This was in reply to my plan.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

All the historical precedents show that fixing the day for resumption inevitably led to a contraction of the currency by the banks, so that when the day came the actual scarcity of currency prevented a demand for coin; and this process of contraction both in England and the United States produced the sorest distress; and this distress was only relieved in England by the Parliament requiring the loan of exchequer bills and new issues by the Bank of England. At the beginning of our Government the continental bonds were a species of currency, and as a part of the funding system of Alexander Hamilton, he provided for a new paper currency, convertible into coin, to be issued by the Bank of the United States, and without which he declared his funding system would be a failure. So, sir, after the war of 1812 the sore distress caused by the failure of the State banks was only relieved by a new paper currency issued by the second Bank of the United States, which Mr. Madison, yielding his constitutional objections, approved. We, therefore, think that the general objects sought for by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] can be better attained by legalizing specie contracts, by utilizing the coin in the Treasury, by the gradual substitution of coin, United States notes, and bank bills for the present currency, rather than accumulating gold and fixing a day for resumption.—Congressional Globe, part 1, third session, Fortieth Congress, 1868-'69, page 630.

Mr. MORTON. My friend said that all the historic precedents then were against fixing a time for resumption. He had his "little plan" just as he has now—no; I will not call it a little plan, a big one—but he had his plan then of resuming specie payments by authorizing people to make contracts to pay in coin, looking entirely into the future, until all the contracts should become coin contracts, so that resumption would have no effect upon past contracts, and of course it would take some years for the old contracts to pass out of existence. My friend has now come to the conclusion that we can fix a time, and we can fix it as early as the 1st of January, 1875, and he thought last winter as early as the 1st of January, 1874. When he brought forward his plan last winter, I undertook to make an argument against it, and I had drawn my ideas, as I had in regard to greenbacks, from his speech of 1869. He had shown to me what would be the effect of the sudden appreciation of the currency. I bore that speech in mind. I did not quote it on him. I knew he had the right to change his mind. I knew he had a right to do it, because he had done it on several occasions. I did not quote his old speech. I thought that was a lame sort of argument to resort to; but still I had some of his ideas in my mind; and now, as he thought that appreciating the currency 34 per cent. in three years would be absolute destruction, we may get from his argument some idea of what the effect of the appreciation of it 11 per cent. would be in ten months; and I ask the Secretary to read it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Persons of fixed salaries and incomes are benefited by an appreciation of the currency to the full extent of the appreciation. Their incomes have increased purchasing power, and they are enabled to extend their purchases, supply new wants, and add to their capital. The opposite effect during the war, when the currency was being depreciated, carried distress and want and poverty into many comfortable homes. It fell with severe effect upon preachers and widows and old men, who saw the purchasing power of their annuities melt away, and a condition of independence changed to poverty and want. They will, by an appreciation of the currency, be restored to their own again.

Merchants, dealers, traders, and bankers will be affected by an appreciation of the currency precisely as their debts and credits bear to each other. If they owe more than they can promptly collect on debts due to them, they must lose to the full extent of the appreciation; and they must make this loss good by a sale of a part of their property at reduced prices, or by contracting new debts to be paid in an appreciated currency. As a general rule, any appreciation of the currency is injurious to all these classes; for they are generally in debt; and even where enough is due to them to pay with, yet the delay in payment or the failure of their debtors almost always embarrasses them. Commercial and banking usage compels promptness, so that a merchant or a banker, however prudent he may be, is often compelled to sacrifice his assets to meet a sudden appreciation of the currency.

But the distress caused by an appreciation of the currency falls mainly on the debtor class; others suffer only by reason of his inability to pay. What does specie payment mean to a debtor? It means the payment of one hundred and thirty-five dollars where he has agreed to pay one hundred, or, which is the same thing, the payment of one hundred dollars where he has agreed to pay seventy-four. Where he has purchased property and paid one-fourth of it, it means the loss of the property. It means the addition of one-fourth to all currency debts in the United States. A measure to require a debtor now to pay his debt in gold, or currency equivalent to gold, requires him to pay one hundred and thirty-five bushels of wheat when he agreed to pay one hundred, and if this appreciation is extended through a period of three years it requires him to pay an interest of 12 per cent. in addition to the rate he has agreed to pay. When we consider the enormous indebtedness of a new country like ours, where capital is scarce, and where credit has been substituted in the place of capital, it presents a difficulty that may well cause us to pause. We may see that the chasm must be crossed, but it will make us wary of our footsteps. Good faith and public policy demand that we appreciate our currency to gold, but in the process we must be careful that bankruptcy, distress, and want do not fall upon our fellow-citizens who have based their obligations upon your broken promises. The debtors of this country include the active, enterprising, energetic men in all the various employments of life. It is a serious proposition to change their contracts so as in effect to require them to pay one-third more than they agreed to pay. They have not paused in their business to study questions of political economy. They have based their operations upon this money, which you have declared to be lawful money. You may change its relative value, but in doing so you should give them a reasonable opportunity to change their contracts so as to adapt them to the new standards of value you may prescribe for them.

Before discussing the measure proposed by the committee, which Senators may consider not specific enough, or not rapid enough, let us look to history for lights to guide us in a most difficult and dangerous passage.

The appreciation of the currency is a far more distressing operation than Senators may suppose. Our own and other nations have gone through this process before, and always with the sorest distress. Sometimes they have repudiated the depreciated currency, and, from the necessity of the case, fallen back upon barter and gold. Such, as I have already stated, was the case with the continental money, with the French assignats, and with confederate scrip. All these revolutionary movements were accompanied with the utter destruction of credit and trade. We have also to guide us several examples of the appreciation of a debased currency.

At the revolution of 1688 in England, the silver coin, then a legal tender, had become so depreciated by wear and by clipping as to be worth only 75 per cent. of the mint standard, and this was practically the only currency. It became necessary to appreciate this currency to the mint standard. As all prices and obligations of debt had become adjusted to the lowered value of the existing coin, it was proposed to reduce the mint standard to the current standard, or to issue new shillings at one and one-fourth shillings. This was opposed by Isaac Newton and John Locke, the two "foremost men of all the world," who contended that if the loss of recoinage was thrown upon the mint it would not affect the individuals at all. This view was strongly opposed by practical merchants, but new shillings were issued and exchanged for the old shillings at par. As between the mint and the holder of the old shillings this was all right; but the effect was immediately disastrous upon all prices. It took one-third more commodities to get the new shillings, but the old number of shillings was required to pay a debt. Merchants, traders, and debtors were ruined. The Bank of England, then in its infancy, only escaped failure by issuing its notes payable in installments. A rival bank was utterly wrecked. Small capitalists found themselves ruined, and laborers and artisans deprived of employment. Hence the unpopularity of William III, and the prevalence of general discontent during his reign.

A similar condition of currency to our own existed in Great Britain after the general peace of 1815. For eighteen years the notes of the Bank of England were practically a legal tender, and upon them, as upon our greenbacks, was based a currency issued by the country banks. Though the aggregate of all this paper circulation never amounted to $250,000,000, yet it at times depreciated from 20 to 30 per cent. below par.

Mr. MORTON. At that point I wish to call attention to a fact that is referred to there by my friend, and which is overlooked in the argument here. At the time of the suspension of specie payments in England the country banks, joint-stock banks, were only required to redeem in notes of the Bank of England, just as national banks now are required to redeem in the greenbacks. The notes of the Bank of England were not depreciated, and were not injured by the increase of the joint-stock banks that were required to redeem in the notes of the Bank of England. On the contrary, it is a matter of public history that the increase of that circulation of the joint-stock banks at that time furnished great relief to England, although they were only required to redeem in the notes of the Bank of England that were themselves a legal tender and at a large discount.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the extract from Mr. SHERMAN'S speech, as follows:

When the war was over measures were slowly adopted for the appreciation of this currency to the gold standard. These measures resulted in a reduction of the paper currency from $231,000,000 in 1815 to $152,000,000 in 1821. Commercial paper, discounted at the Bank of England, fell from $75,000,000 in 1815 to $13,000,000 in 1821. It is only necessary to appeal to the histories of the time to show the disastrous effect. The productive value of capital was increased 50 per cent. A thousand dollars in 1821 would buy more than $1,800 in 1815. Small traders, debtors, and laborers were reduced to the sorest distress. The loss to them was far greater than the actual depreciation of the currency, for all confidence and trust were lost.

Mr. MORTON. I do not care about taking time to read any further. There is much good reading in that speech besides what we have had; and there are one or two other speeches of my friend, if I had time to look them up, that I think run strongly in the same direction. It shows that my friend, like others, is fallible; and that the spirit of change sometimes comes upon him as well as upon others.

Now, Mr. President, one word in regard to the remark of the Senator from Missouri a little while ago. As I had occasion to say yesterday, the Senator in his speech devoted a very considerable part of it to me; and it was made quite as personal and as offensive, not only in matter but in manner, as it could well be to be parliamentary. When I said I thought the Senator did not understand this country, I did not mean by that to say that all of our foreign-born citizens do not understand this country—no such thing. The Senator has no right to give the remark that construction. He has no right to make himself the representative of all our foreign-born citizens in that way. I think my friend tried the experiment some two or three years ago of putting himself forward as the representative of citizens of foreign birth, and attempted in that way to lead them out of one party and use them in the formation of a new one. I think his experience was not very satisfactory, and it would hardly be worth his while to try the experiment again.

He says that I have changed my opinions oftener than any other public man. I think that remark will require some qualification, especially at his hands. I have had occasion to change my mind several times during my life upon questions, and I shall do it again whenever I think I am in the wrong. I started with the republican party in 1854, and I never have changed my mind to that extent that I was required to get out of the party. I have never betrayed my principles. I have never betrayed my friends. I have never betrayed those who elevated me to power, and sought to use that power for their destruction. If I have changed my mind upon this question or upon that, I think that is what happens to all men who hold themselves amenable to instruction and to learning from experience and observation.

Mr. SCHURZ. I expected from the Senator from Indiana exactly the reply that he has just made. I want him to point out in my record a single principle that I ever betrayed. I want him to show, in the platforms of policy I have supported, a single contradiction. He will not find one. He has never left his party. I have never betrayed my principles. There is the difference between him and me. I alluded to the fact that yesterday, when we happened to differ in opinion, one of the first things he threw at me was that I did not understand this country; he spoke of Germany as "his own country," meaning mine. I understand the meaning of that very well; and I repeat again that I think it betrays very little appreciation of the rights of the foreign-born citizen if he is only recognized as an equal when he happens to coincide with your views and serves your interests. I maintain that I have just as much right to differ with the Senator from Indiana as he has to differ with me, wherever I may have been born; and I shall always claim that privilege.

But now, in conclusion, I will say to him that if my remarks yesterday were offensive to him I am free to say I regret it. I am sure that I made my remarks very general, and when I addressed them to him I combated his arguments and not his person. But I cannot refrain from saying, also, that in the reply he made I found a jumble of misstatements so atrocious and so willful that I can hardly think they were made unwittingly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is transgressing parliamentary rules.

Mr. SCHURZ. Then I retract the expression I have used and say I found misstatements which, if the Senator from Indiana had listened to me with a desire to understand me, he could not possibly have made. I did not reply to him on the spot as I at first attempted—I had, without being permitted to do so, tried to interrupt him—for when misstatements become so gross and manifold, then at last even your desire to refute them may give way.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, my speech is in the hands of the Public Printer. It will appear whenever that of the Senator appears, following it immediately; and if there are misstatements in that speech, the Senator will have an opportunity and the means of pointing them out; and if he can show substantially that I have made a misstatement, I think I will have the magnanimity to confess it. I did not intend to do the Senator any injustice. He did not offend me; I did not feel hurt at what he said; but he is not ingenuous, I think, when he says that he did not aim his speech particularly at me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is out of order to charge another Senator with being disingenuous.

Mr. SCHURZ. Now, Mr. President, if you will permit me a single moment. If the Senator from Indiana knows anything, he must know——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the Senator from Indiana yielded the floor?

Mr. MORTON. I had not; I was called to order. But if the Senator from Missouri wants to speak, I will yield to him.

Mr. SCHURZ. Thank you. If the Senator from Indiana knows anything, and he knows a great many things, he must be aware that I do not entertain any personal unkindness to him. He knows also that he is a very strong debater, and that in combating his skill we must summon all the resources that we can command. It was against his theories I was fighting, and not against his person; and as long as he carries on his warfare in the same spirit I do not think there will ever be occasion for personal unfriendliness between us, as I hope there is not now. When I say that his allusion to my foreign birth yesterday, in the connection and in the manner in which he made it, was a little offensive, I suppose he cannot find that surprising; not that I am ashamed of the place in which I was born, for surely I am not, as I have no reason to be; but because I think, standing as I do here as a representative of one of the States, and having been sent here by Americans to represent them as an American citizen, enjoying the full right to express my own views, that right ought not to be slighted by any one who is my equal but not my superior, although I happened to be born upon foreign soil.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President there is a little assumption in the remarks of my friend—but as he makes them good-naturedly I shall receive them in the same way—that I intended to refer to the fact of his foreign birth as an objection, or as an argument against him. Those who know me, and who know my political life, know there can be no foundation for that. Among many of my earliest and most earnest friends in Indiana have been men of foreign birth, and they are to-day; and I think I may say to my friend, without offense, that I have represented them as truly and I am as good a friend to them to-day as himself. I spoke of Germany as "his country," because he came from Germany. I did not speak of it or intend to mean that it was his country now. He is an American by adoption, an American by naturalization. But I was referring to the country from which he came, and of which he spoke repeatedly, and of which he often speaks to us. He had just come from that country, and he spoke of it repeatedly, I believe, in his speech; and I referred to it naturally as his country, not meaning to impute to him that he was not faithful to his obligations as an American citizen.

Mr. SCHURZ. To put an end to this whole controversy, do I understand the Senator from Indiana to say that he used that expression only in a Pickwickian sense? If he does that, then I will say that I used mine in a Pickwickian sense, too.

Mr. MORTON. Well, Mr. President, I was not exactly in a Pickwickian mood yesterday. I do not often debate in a Pickwickian sense. I used the expression very naturally, and in reply to the Senator, who had referred to Germany and referred to his visit there. I knew that he had just gone to his home, which was a very natural thing, and he was extremely sensitive when he seized upon the expression, and in his remarks a little while ago attempted to make the expression as applicable to men of foreign birth, when it was not. My friend is partial to his country—I cannot blame him for that—because I remember some two or three years ago my friend arraigned our Government upon this floor for having violated our neutrality with Germany in the sale of arms to France, and insisted that we had been guilty of a breach of international law that was even cause of war.

Mr. SCHURZ. I did not insist upon anything of the kind.

Mr. MORTON. I excuse my friend because of that natural feeling that every man must have for the fatherland.

Now, Mr. President, if my friend says he did not intend yesterday to be personal, I do not intend to be personal; and if he insists that he was speaking in a Pickwickian sense, I will say that I was also.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, these two honorable belligerents have settled the matter to their satisfaction, I have no doubt. There is no occasion certainly for any controversy between them. They seem to esteem each other so highly, that there cannot be anything but love between them. There has only been a difference of opinion between them.

Now, I desire to state to my honorable friend from Indiana that every word that he has had read at the desk I heartily approve of. I never have sought to avoid the dangers and the difficulties that come to us from specie payments. There is not a single word in that speech that I would not utter again if I had occasion. They are my sentiments. I do believe, however, that we are in a different condition now from what we were in 1868. Then we had a greater volume of currency. We had also had a contraction of $44,000,000. We had also a controversy as to whether the bonds could not be paid in greenbacks; and we were under quite different circumstances. I did then oppose any immediate plan for the resumption of specie payments; but it seems to me we are now in different condition. As the Senator says, there is really but 10 per cent. difference between currency and gold. There is no difficulty about resumption. The only hardship in the way is just exactly what I pointed out in that speech four years ago; that is, the effect it may have upon debtors. But for that question there would be no trouble in a prompt resumption of specie payments, and, as a matter of course, any provision that is made, to use the language I used then, must be made with careful consideration of the rights of debtors and creditors. That is the only difficulty in the way. But I do believe, as the difference now has come down to be a difference of one year's interest, the time has arrived when we should fix a date for the resumption of specie payments, and adopt measures to promote it. Therefore I do not plead guilty to the charge of inconsistency that my honorable friend makes against me; nor did I quote his remarks made in 1868 in any unkind sense. I used his remarks then simply as an answer to his remarks now. It is the right of every Senator to change his mind. The Senator acknowledges that he has exercised that right; and I have no doubt that I have exercised the same right, only he has not convicted me of it by the reading of those extracts. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. CAMERON. These general explanations do not amount to much, for to-morrow we shall forget all about them. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting the question on that motion, with the permission of the Senate, the Chair will lay before the Senate certain House bills for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 919) to provide for the issuing and recording of commissions to postmasters appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

A bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits, and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 2186) granting an American registry to the American-built Peruvian steamship Rayo, now rebuilt in the United States and converted into a sailing-vessel—to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (H. R. No. 2191) in relation to the customs duties on imported fruits—to the Committee on Finance.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will also lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

The message was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor herewith to submit the report of the centennial commissioners, and to add a word in the way of recommendation.

There have now been international expositions held by three of the great powers of Europe. It seems fitting that the one hundredth anniversary of our Independence should be marked by an event that will display to the world the growth and progress of a nation devoted to freedom, and to the pursuit of fame, fortune, and honors by the lowest citizen as well as the highest. A failure in this enterprise would be deplorable. Success can be assured by arousing public opinion to the importance of the occasion.

To secure this end, in my judgment, congressional legislation is necessary to make the exposition both national and international.

The benefits to be derived from a successful international exposition are manifold. It will necessarily be accompanied by expenses beyond the receipts from the exposition itself, but they will be compensated for many-fold by the commingling of people from all sections of our own country; by bringing together the people of different nationalities; by bringing into juxtaposition, for ready examination, our own and foreign skill and progress in manufactures, agriculture, art, science, and civilization.

The selection of the site for the exposition seems to me appropriate, from the fact that one hundred years before the date fixed for the exposition the Declaration of Independence, which launched us into the galaxy of nations as an independent people, emanated from the same spot.

We have much in our varied climate, soil, mineral products, and skill, of which advantage can be taken by other nationalities to their profit. In return they will bring to our shores works of their skill, and familiarize our people with them, to the mutual advantage of all parties.

Let us have a complete success in our centennial exposition, or suppress it in its infancy, acknowledging our inability to give it the international character to which our self-esteem aspires.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 25, 1874.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Accompanying this message of the President is the annual report of the centennial commissioners, so called.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that it be printed and laid on the table with the message.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

Mr. CAMERON. I addressed the Chair, and intended to say that that was a very sensible and very opportune message, and I move now to take up the bill from the House of Representatives in regard to the centennial exhibition. I make the motion with a view of letting it lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania withdraws the motion for an executive session, and moves that the pending and all prior orders be postponed and the centennial bill, so called, be taken up for consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. I renew the motion for an executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending which the Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened and (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 25, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ESTIMATES OF DEFICIENCIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of the deficiencies in appropriations required to complete the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and prior years; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SHASTA COUNTY INDIANS, CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to an appropriation to aid the Indians in Shasta County, California; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE OF OFFICERS ON FRONTIER SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting to the House a petition of officers of the Sixth Infantry, asking that troops serving on the frontier be placed upon a better footing with regard to leave of absence; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF COLORADO RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to a project for the protection of the banks of the Colorado River at Yuma depot; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

NEW YORK INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to a memorial of the Indians on the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations in New York; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to an appropriation for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INDIANS IN NEVADA, CALIFORNIA, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the condition and wants of the Ute Indians of Utah, the Pi-Utes of Utah, Northern Arizona, Southern Nevada, and Southeastern California; the Go-si Utes of Utah and Nevada; the Northwestern Shoshones of Idaho and Utah, and the Western Shoshones of Nevada; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MISSION INDIANS IN CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report showing the necessity that exists for legislation in behalf of the Mission Indians of California; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF THE RIO GRANDE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to an appropriation for the protection of the river banks of the Rio Grande, from the site of Fort Brown, Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE OHIO RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a further report on the improvement of the Ohio River below the Falls; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CULTIVATION OF TIMBER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith a memorial upon the "cultivation of timber and the preservation of forests," and a draught of a joint resolution prepared by the American Association for the Advancement of Science, together with a communication from the General Land Office upon the same subject.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 19, 1874.

The message was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

RESTORATION OF LANDS TO MARKET.

Mr. BRADLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1700) to amend the act entitled "An act for the restoration to market of certain lands in Michigan," approved July 10, 1872; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THE MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at eighteen minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports are in order from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REAR-ADMIRAL B. F. SANDS.

Mr. SCOFIELD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 1418) to retain Rear-Admiral B. F. Sands on the active list of the Navy; and the same was laid on the table.

JOHN HOLROYD.

Mr. SCOFIELD also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 816) for the payment of John Holroyd, for the use of his patent and inventions by the Government; and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. ARCHER, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 884) relating to the naval service; which was laid on the table.

JOHN R. BOND.

Mr. BURLEIGH, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 560) for the relief of John R. Bond, late of the United States Navy; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

CURTIS D. NILES AND OTHERS.

Mr. GOOCH, from the same committee, reported back adversely a petition of Curtis D. Niles and 24 graduates of the United States Naval Academy of the date of June 4, 1869, praying the said graduates may take rank from the date of their graduation; which was laid on the table.

MISS SARAH M. TUTTLE.

Mr. GOOCH also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of Miss Sarah M. Tuttle, daughter of Commodore Henry Bruce, United States Navy, asking that said Bruce may receive pay according to his rank of commodore; which was laid on the table.

WILLIAM KILBURN.

Mr. GOOCH also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (S. No. 437) to restore William Kilburn, of San Francisco, California, to the Navy of the United States as an ensign, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the President of the United States to restore William Kilburn to the Navy of the United States as an ensign at the foot of the class of 1870, of which he was a member at the time of his resignation.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope we will receive more explanation of this bill before it is passed.

Mr. GOOCH. I ask that the letter which I send up may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 24, 1874.

SIR: A bill has passed the Senate restoring to the Navy Mr. William Kilburn. Mr. Kilburn graduated at the Naval Academy at Annapolis with credit to himself, and promised to make a valuable officer, but resigned under temporary sickness and affliction in his family.

The bill places him at the foot of his class, and under these circumstances the Department has no objection to interpose.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. G. W. SCOFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN. That letter does not seem to be entirely satisfactory. It simply informs Congress the Navy Department has no objection to interpose to this proposed action.

Inasmuch as the public service does not require, it would seem, an increase in the number of officers in the Navy, and as there has been a resignation in this case, some urgent consideration ought certainly to be presented for the restoration of this man. I do not remember that such action as is here proposed has ever been taken unless in very exceptional cases. During a time of war, when it is important to have additional officers, there might be some propriety in such action; but in time of profound peace, some very strong public reason should certainly be offered to justify the measure here proposed.

Mr. GOOCH. I understand the facts in this case to be substantially these: This young man was educated at the Naval Academy, taking good rank in his class and receiving the commendation of all the officers of the institution at the time of his graduation. He was then assigned to duty. He was on some squadron in the Mediterranean, I think, and had been absent something like a year when he learned that his father was lying very sick in Philadelphia. The young man was exceedingly anxious to be relieved and go home, that he might, if possible, see his father before his death. The commanding officer did not grant him leave of absence; it was suggested that it would be necessary for him, if he saw fit to leave, to resign. Under those circumstances he tendered his resignation. He has since asked to be restored to his position in the Navy.

He is a man educated at the expense of the Government, in every respect a worthy and competent man, fully qualified to discharge the duties of his profession. Under these circumstances he asks that he may be permitted to go back into the position in which he was at the time of his resignation, the position for which he had been educated by the Government. If it is an object for us to keep up an institution for the education of these young men in order that they may serve the country when their services are required, I can see no reason why, under the state of circumstances here presented, we should not take back this young man and avail ourselves of that which the Government has already bestowed upon him in giving him an education and fitting him for the discharge of the duties of a naval officer. These I understand to have been the reasons which operated upon the Senate in passing this bill; and they are reasons which have influenced the committee of this House, and induced them to report this bill and ask its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GOOCH] inform the House how long this young man was in actual service in the Navy after graduating at Annapolis, and how long he has been out of the service?

Mr. GOOCH. He graduated at Annapolis in 1870; he served, I think, for something more than a year after his graduation, and then resigned; so that he has been out of the service perhaps a year and a half. I am not exactly certain as to the time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was passed.

Mr. GOOCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLOTHING FOR MEN AND BOYS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2197) providing for an outfit of clothing to enlisted men and boys in the Navy.

The bill was read. It provides that the enlisted men and boys in the Navy shall be allowed an outfit and yearly allowance of clothing, free of charge to them, as follows: that their outfit on enlistment shall consist of one pea-jacket, or monkey-jacket, two flannel overshirts, two woolen undershirts, two pairs woolen drawers, two pairs woolen socks, one pair satinet trousers, one pair cloth trousers, one seamless cap, two pairs canvas-duck trousers, one pair calf-skin shoes, two linen frocks, one pair blankets, one mattress, and one black silk handkerchief; and that yearly thereafter, during their term of service, they shall have an allowance of clothing equivalent, as nearly as possible, to that now or hereafter allowed to the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates in the Army.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I make the point of order that this bill must go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point that this bill requires an appropriation of money and must be first considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The point of order is good. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

PAY OF CIVIL ENGINEERS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1621) fixing the pay of civil engineers in the Navy.

The bill was read. It provides that the pay of civil engineers in the Navy shall hereafter be, according to their length of service in their profession, the same as fixed by law for naval constructors.

Mr. MYERS. This bill, I suppose, must take the same direction as the last.

The SPEAKER. It will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ERRORS IN PRIZE-LISTS.

Mr. LAMISON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 690) authorizing corrections to be made in errors in prize-lists; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM C. BRASHEAR.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2198) for the relief of the heirs at law of William C. Brashear, an officer of the Texas navy; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order on that bill, that it contains an appropriation, and it should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is good.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NAVY-YARD AT PORT ROYAL.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 841) to establish a navy-yard at Port Royal, South Carolina; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

NAVY-YARD AT WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 803) to increase the facilities for docking, building, and repairing at the navy-yard at Washington, District of Columbia; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PAYMASTER GEORGE PLUNKETT.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1543) to enable the President of the United States to revoke the acceptance of the resignation of Paymaster George Plunkett; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF FORT NORFOLK POWDER MAGAZINE.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 83) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to remove the powder magazine from Fort Norfolk, Norfolk, Virginia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized and instructed to cause the powder magazine now located at Fort Norfolk, at the entrance of Norfolk Harbor, and near Norfolk, Virginia, to be removed from its present location.

The amendment of the committee was as follows:

In line 4 strike out the words "and instructed," and insert in lieu thereof "if in his judgment necessary."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. McKEE. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. If the gentleman desires an explanation of the objects of this bill, I will make a brief statement. Every year, for the last ten years, the Secretary of the Navy and the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance have, in their reports, recommended the removal of this powder magazine, which is situated at Fort Norfolk, close to the city of Norfolk, at the entrance of the harbor. There is beside it a large manufacturing establishment, a foundery, and a steam-engineering establishment. Three times during the last three years the dry grass on the lawn in front of the magazine has been set on fire by sparks from vessels passing, and the powder magazine, as well as the entire city of Norfolk, is endangered by the risk of explosion. Last year, in the Forty-second Congress, the Committee on Appropriations inserted an item in the appropriation bill providing for the removal of this magazine. They did this after careful consideration of the subject, and after having the Chief of Ordnance and other officers of the Navy Department before them. This was stricken out in the House on a point of order, made by a gentleman then a member of Congress from Illinois, that it was not authorized by any existing law. Under this state of affairs the Committee on Naval Affairs have directed me to ask the passage of this bill, and I presume there will be no objection to it.

Mr. FORT. I would like the bill to be again read.

The bill was again read.

The bill was passed.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMISSIONS TO POSTMASTERS.

Mr. ORTH, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 919) to provide for the issuing and recording of commissions to postmasters appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The bill was read. It provides that hereafter the commissions of all postmasters appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made out and recorded in the Post-Office Department, and shall be under the seal of said Department, and countersigned by the Postmaster-General, any laws to the contrary notwithstanding; provided that the said seal shall not be affixed to any such commission until after the same shall have been signed by the President of the United States.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. WOOD. Does the Committee on Foreign Affairs report that bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill is reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WOOD. I would like to know if a bill of that character can emanate from that committee?

Mr. ORTH. I will state why this bill comes from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Soon after the organization of the State Department that Department was intrusted with the duty of signing all commissions of the various officers of the Government. Under that law all the commissions of the present Postmaster-General of the country have still to be signed by the Secretary of State. The object of this bill is to transfer that duty from the State Department to the Post-Office Department.

As to the question of jurisdiction, and how we obtain it, I will say to the gentleman from New York that we obtained it by the order of this House. All commissions now under the law are required to be signed and sealed by the Secretary of State. Our committee have concluded to recommend the passage of this bill, transferring that duty to the Postmaster-General, to whom it properly belongs, so as no longer to incumber the State Department with what properly belongs to another Department of this Government.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if any provision is made for reducing the number of clerks in the State Department, and increasing the number in the Post-Office Department; or for transferring the clerk who now performs that duty in the one Department to the other?

Mr. ORTH. I will state to the gentleman that there is no necessity for such a transfer. The duty is not so onerous as to require any special provision for it.

Mr. GARFIELD. There are only about eleven hundred postmasters appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I should suppose it would take a considerable portion of the time of one clerk at least to prepare these commissions.

Mr. ORTH. It does not take much time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REORGANIZATION OF THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ORTH, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, also reported back, with amendments, House bill No. 1755, to provide for a more complete organization of the State Department.

Mr. SPEER. I make the point of order that this bill should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole, as it provides for new officers and for the payment of their salaries by money appropriated out of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the amendments, ordered to be printed.

TRIBUNALS IN OTTOMAN DOMINIONS AND EGYPT.

Mr. ORTH, from the same committee, reported back, with amendments, House bill No. 1015, to authorize the President to accept for citizens of the United States the jurisdiction of certain tribunals in the Ottoman dominions and Egypt, established, or to be established, under the authority of the Sublime Porte and of the government of Egypt.

The bill, which was read, provides that whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory information that the Ottoman government, or that of Egypt, has organized other tribunals on a basis likely to secure to citizens of the United States, in their dominions, the same impartial justice which they now enjoy there under the judicial functions exercised by the minister, consuls, and other functionaries of the United States, pursuant to the act of Congress approved the 22d of June, 1860, entitled "An act to carry into effect provisions of the treaties between the United States, China, Persia, and other countries, giving certain judicial powers to ministers and consuls or other functionaries of the United States in those countries, and for other purposes," he is hereby authorized to suspend the operations of said acts as to the dominions in which such tribunals may be organized, and to notify the government of the Sublime Porte, or that of Egypt, or either of them, that the United States, during such suspension, accept for their citizens the jurisdiction of the tribunals aforesaid over citizens of the United States which has heretofore been exercised by the minister, consuls, and other functionaries of the United States; and in section two it provides that from and after the date of the notification aforesaid the judicial powers conferred upon and exercised by the minister, consuls, and other functionaries of the United States, pursuant to the act of Congress aforesaid, shall, in respect to the Ottoman dominions, or Egypt, or both, be suspended during the pleasure of the President.

Mr. ORTH. I will explain briefly the object of this bill. By an act of Congress, passed in 1860, our ministers and consuls residing in what are known as non-Christian countries, are invested with certain judicial functions, so far as American citizens in those countries are concerned, and authorized to settle any disputes, civil or criminal, arising between them. In other words, they carry with them to the non-Christian countries to which they are sent and accredited the laws of our own country, and they act as judges and executive officers in determining and carrying out these laws as between American citizens, or between American citizens and subjects of the country in which these disputes may occur.

The object of this bill is to suspend the operation of that law so far as it relates to the Turkish dominions. It is done for this reason: Within the last few years the Turkish Empire has made rapid strides towards what we denominate civilization. It has proposed to the Christian nations of the world that, with the consent of these nations, it will establish what are known as mixed courts, composed in part of native judges and in part of judges who may be appointed by the Turkish Empire upon the recommendation of Christian nations. Those courts, when established, are to have complete and ample jurisdiction of all matters that now pertain to the consular and diplomatic courts established under the act of 1860. In pursuance of this suggestion, emanating from the Ottoman Porte, all the governments of Europe, with the exception of France, have acceded to what is known as the Turkish concession on this subject. For some reason France has not acceded to it. The court, however, has been established. I notice in a recent London paper the appointment of a barrister from England who is to take his seat there as the English judge. And I doubt not that when this Government shall have likewise acceded to the proposition of the Turkish Empire, some American citizen whom this Government may designate will be appointed as one of the judges of this new tribunal.

I have examined at some length the provisions which have been adopted both in the Turkish Empire proper and in the dominion of Egypt. I find that they secure to the suitors in these courts all the guarantees that we expect in any court exercising common-law jurisdiction. They provide, for instance, for trial by jury; that the party shall be represented by counsel, and that witnesses shall possess certain qualifications. They also provide for carrying into effect the judgments of these courts, with this additional provision, that in no instance shall a judgment be carried into effect in a capital case without the nation to which the citizen belongs who has been charged and found guilty of the capital offense shall first have been notified and its permission obtained to carry the sentence into execution.

Mr. CONGER. Does the power of this court extend to the duties of consuls in regard to seamen?

Mr. ORTH. Not at all. The law in regard to seamen remains as now in any Christian country in Europe. This court applies only to American citizens residing in the Ottoman Empire, and we have quite a number there; to disputes arising between those citizens, and between them and the subjects of the Ottoman Porte. It does not interfere at all with the duties, rights, or responsibilities of consuls with regard to their ordinary consular duties.

Mr. CONGER. Would it affect the rights of seamen? Would it be a court in which a seaman might make complaint against his officer, or officers against their seamen? Would it interfere at all with the arrangements on board of American ships between American seamen and American officers?

Mr. ORTH. Not at all. Those rights will remain just as they now are under the general consular regulations of the country.

One remark further. This bill provides that this suspension of the law of 1860, by the President, shall be only temporary; that so long as in his judgment the courts of the Ottoman Empire grant to our citizens the same ample protection which they now receive at the hands of our minister and consuls, the act shall be suspended. But the moment the courts of the Ottoman Empire fail to furnish such protection the President is to revoke the suspension, and reclothe our officers with the functions they now possess under the act of 1860.

I wish also to call attention to the second section of the bill, which provides that American citizens may acquire, possess, and transfer real estate. Now this cannot be done in any portion of the Ottoman Empire; but the Turkish government has consented that all foreigners may hold, occupy, possess, and transfer real estate to the same extent that a subject of the Ottoman Empire can do now, whenever the government to which that foreign resident belongs shall have consented to what is known as the protocol or proposition of the Turkish Empire upon this subject. I will give just one instance of the inconvenience at present attending the holding of real property by American citizens in that empire. An American citizen going there for the purpose of trade or business, and acquiring property, must hold it in the name of some subject of the Turkish Empire; he cannot hold it in his own name; he cannot incumber it by judgment or mortgage; he cannot avail himself of the benefits of the bankrupt law of the Turkish Empire; in other words, he is at the mercy of the Turkish subject whom he may select as the person in whom he will vest the title of his property. Take for instance the vast property belonging to the Roberts College, near Constantinople. It is an American college founded by a distinguished citizen of the State of New York, and endowed by him for the purpose of educating American and Turkish youths. It is in a very flourishing condition. Yet the title to that property is held to-day by so insecure a tenure as I have described. In this connection I will ask the Clerk to read, for the information of the House, a memorandum of President Hamlin, the distinguished president of that college.

The Clerk read as follows:

Memorandum on the holding of real estate by Americans in Turkey.

1. The tenure of real estate among foreigners has been hitherto uncertain and unsatisfactory both to them and to the Turkish government.

2. The laws, or rather customs, of inheritance in regard to such property have been especially vexatious and uncertain, giving rise to constant litigation.

3. A protocol regulating all these interests has been prepared, and is, on the whole, satisfactory to foreigners, and all the European nations have signed it, even Greece and Russia. The United States not having signed it, no American is allowed to take advantage of the new tenure, and the old is wholly discredited. I tried myself, for full six months, after all the terms were settled, to effect the sale or transfer of one piece of land and the purchase of another, but in vain.

4. In the present abnormal state no American property is under any secure law of inheritance.

5. The Turkish government is annoyed by our refusing to sign the protocol, and will not accord any favor or right to any American citizen, if it can be avoided. The answer to every application is, "Why do you not sign the protocol?"

6. So far as I know, the only opposition now made is from American citizens formerly Turkish subjects, (Armenians, Greeks, and Jews.) All American-born citizens (including now those in Beirut and Syria) are perfectly willing to pay the taxes and assume all the responsibilities the protocol imposes.

7. The signing of the protocol is a thing by itself. It demands no reciprocity. Other nations have accorded none. It should not be tacked on to anything else, but be simply signed as a thing unique, designed to clear away long-standing difficulties and opprobriones of local diplomacy.

CYRUS HAMLIN,
President of Roberts College, Constantinople.

Mr. ORTH. I hold in my hand the law referred to in the communication just read. I do not care about having this law read unless it is specially desired; but——

Mr. McKEE. I hope the gentleman will have it read. I would like to hear it, as doubtless other members would.

Mr. ORTH. Then I will send it to the Clerk. I ask the attention of members to it as furnishing most conclusive evidence of the progress of that empire and the liberality which it is disposed to exercise, not only toward its own subjects, but which it is willing to extend to every foreigner residing within the Turkish dominions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Law ceding to foreigners the right to possessing property (real estate) in the Ottoman Empire.

In the view of developing the prosperity of the country, to put an end to the difficulties, abuses, and unsettledness produced on the subject of the exercise of the right of holding property by foreigners in the Ottoman Empire, and to complete, by the means of a precise regulation, the guarantees due to the financial interests and the administrative action of the government, the following legislative arrangements have been adopted by the orders of His Imperial Majesty the Sultan:

ARTICLE 1. Foreigners are allowed, on the same footing as Ottoman subjects and without any other conditions, to enjoy the right of possessing immovable property in the cities and rural parts of the whole of the empire, excepting the province of Hedjas, by submitting to the laws and regulations which govern Ottoman subjects, as hereafter stated. This arrangement does not extend to native Ottoman subjects who may have changed their nationality, and who will be governed in this matter by a special law.

ART. 2. Foreigners owning city and rural property are, consequently, assimilated to Ottoman subjects in all that relates to their immovable property. This assimilation has for legal objects—

1. To oblige them to conform to all of the laws and police regulations, as well as those of a municipal character actually in force, or which may hereafter govern the enjoyment, the transmission, the alienation, and the hypothecation of real estate.

2. To pay all of the taxes and contributions, under whatever form and denomination whatever, now or hereafter affecting city and rural real estate.

3. To render them amenable to the civil Ottoman tribunals for all questions relating to real estate, and for all real actions thereon, either as plaintiffs or defendants, even when both parties are foreigners; all on the same footing, under the same conditions and in the same favors as Ottoman proprietors, and without their having any right to put forward their personal nationality; but yet, under the reservations of the immunities attached to their persons and to their movable property, according to the treaty stipulations.

ART. 3. In case of the bankruptcy of a foreigner owning real estate, the syndics of the bankruptcy will proceed to take action thereon, before the Ottoman authorities and the civil Ottoman tribunals, for the purpose of demanding the sale of the immovable property owned by the bankrupt, and which, by their nature and conformably with the law, may answer for the debts of the owner.

This same rule will be carried out whenever a foreigner has obtained a judgment before any foreign tribunal condemning another owner of real estate.

For the execution of this judgment on the real estate of his debtor, the foreigner will address himself to the competent Ottoman authority, so as to obtain the sale of the immovable property, answering for the debts of the owner, and their judgment will not be executed by the authorities and Ottoman tribunals until after they shall have established the fact that the immovable property required to be sold really belongs to the category of property which may be sold in payment of debts.

ART. 4. The foreign subject has the faculty of disposing of, by donations or by will, those of his immovable properties which, under this form, are allowed by law to be so donated or willed.

As to the immovable properties which he has not disposed of, or which the law does not allow him to dispose of, by donation or will, their inheritance will be regulated conformably with the Ottoman laws of succession.

ART. 5. Every foreign subject will enjoy the advantages of the present law from the moment that the power (government) to which he belongs shall have adhered to the arrangements proposed by the Sublime Porte for the exercise of the right of holding immovable property.

Mr. ORTH. I desire to add nothing further in behalf of this bill. If any member of the House wishes further information which I can furnish, I will cheerfully answer any question that may be asked.

Mr. WOOD. Some portions of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] were not distinctly heard in this part of the Hall. I would like to know whether this bill is presented with the consent and approval of the State Department, which has more immediate cognizance of our foreign relations, including the relations of this Government to that of Turkey, than we can possibly have ourselves.

Mr. ORTH. In reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] I will say that this bill, with its amendments, meets the approval of the State Department, and is in conformity with the request of our Turkish minister, that we should accede to the proposition made to the Christian countries by the Ottoman Porte. I ask that the amendments be read.

The Clerk read the first amendment, as follows:

In line 18 insert the following words:

So far as the jurisdiction of said tribunal may embrace matters now cognizable by the ministers, consuls, or other functionaries of the United States in said dominions.

Mr. CONGER. I believe that does embrace the proposition of which I spoke.

Mr. ORTH. It refers merely to the tribunals established in Egyptian and Turkish dominions, but these tribunals have no cognizance of consular matters.

Mr. CONGER. I think it would be wrong to take from our consuls the powers they now have.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

In line 20, after the word "suspension," insert the words "will, as aforesaid;" so it will read:

Or that of Egypt, or either of them, that the United States, during such suspension will, as aforesaid, accept for their citizens the jurisdiction of the tribunals aforesaid over citizens of the United States which has heretofore been exercised by the minister, consuls, and other functionaries of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That from and after the date of the notification aforesaid, the judicial powers conferred upon and exercised by the minister, consuls, and other functionaries of the United States, pursuant to the act of Congress aforesaid, shall, in respect to the Ottoman dominions, or Egypt, or both, be suspended during the pleasure of the President.

And in lieu thereof insert the following:

That the President is hereby authorized, for the benefit of American citizens residing in the Turkish dominions, to accept the recent law of the Ottoman Porte, the right of possessing immovable property in said dominions.

Mr. ORTH. The word "foreigners" should be inserted before the word "possessing."

The SPEAKER. That modification will be made.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana there ought to be inserted after the word "Porte" the word "ceding."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. McKEE. I should now like to hear the bill read as it is amended.

The bill was read as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENSHIP.

Mr. ORTH. My colleague on the committee, from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] has a bill in charge which has not received that full consideration in the Committee on Foreign Affairs which he desires to give it. I therefore ask of the House unanimous consent for my colleague to be allowed to report that bill at some other time outside of the present call of our committee. Unless this is granted we shall be compelled to report the bill this morning in a somewhat unfinished condition. Its importance is such I think the House will justify us in keeping it in committee a week or ten days longer, to give it sufficient consideration.

The SPEAKER. The better proceeding for the gentleman would be to report and recommit the bill now, and enter a motion to reconsider, which will enable him to call it up at any time, so as not to interfere with the business of the House.

Mr. E. R. HOAR, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2199) to carry into execution the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution concerning citizenship, and defining certain rights of citizens of the United States in foreign countries, and certain duties of diplomatic and consular officers, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I now move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted, to be called up at some future time.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

MEMPHIS AND KANSAS CITY RAILROAD.

Mr. BUNDY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2000) to declare the Memphis and Kansas City and the Kansas City and Memphis Railroads military and post roads, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed and recommitted.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUNDY also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 776) in aid of the public schools of the District of Columbia; and the same was laid on the table.

Mr. BUNDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Commerce a bill in regard to printing the statistics of immigration prepared at the request of the Secretary of State and of the Secretary of the Treasury. It provides for change of the mode of printing these statistics, and it is necessary to be acted on as soon as possible.

There was no objection.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1364) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the thirteenth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, be, and the same is thereby, repealed; and that hereafter each and every collector of customs to whom shall be delivered the manifests or lists of passengers prescribed by the twelfth section of the act aforesaid, approved March 3, 1855, shall make returns from such manifests or lists of passengers to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in such manner as shall be prescribed by that officer, under whose direction statements of the same shall be prepared and published.

Mr. CONGER. There are now two classes of publication in reference to immigrants arriving in the United States. One from the Department of State, furnished by consuls in reports from foreign countries; and the other furnished by collectors, through the manifests of passengers arriving here. There is no need to publish both statements. The statement published heretofore from the Department of State is imperfect; the other is complete.

The State Department and the Treasury Department both concur in the report which I have here, in recommending the passage of this law, that the whole report may be published in the publication of the Bureau of Statistics, as being the most desirable and perfect mode. The object of the bill is to accomplish that.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS BURKE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 91) for the relief of Thomas Burke, of Virginia; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 825) to provide for the distribution of public documents printed by the authority of Congress and of seeds furnished by the Agricultural Department, for the free exchange of newspapers between publishers, and for the free transmission of weekly newspapers by mail within the county where published. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COBB] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. SMALL,] to have a resolution read.

Mr. SMALL. I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONCORD, NEW HAMPSHIRE, February 23, 1874.

DEAR SIR: Agreeably to a vote of the New Hampshire Press Association, we forward you the following resolutions, passed at annual meeting of said association:

Whereas the law allowing the free circulation of newspapers in counties where printed having been repealed, subjecting subscribers to the same postage on their local papers printed in their own or an adjoining town as is charged on those printed in the farthermost corner of the land; and whereas such indiscrimination is manifestly unjust and oppressive to the county press, and the patrons of local papers:

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be respectfully urged to lay this subject before their honorable bodies, and to use their influence for the modification of the present unjust and oppressive law, and the restoration of the free county clause, or the enactment of a law in a measure regulating postage by the distance papers are sent.

Resolved, That the corresponding secretary be instructed to furnish each of our Senators and Representatives with a copy of these preambles and resolutions, signed by the officers of the association.

The following was also passed:

Resolved, That we deem it inexpedient to take any action that may result directly or indirectly in the restoration of the abuses of the franking privilege.

P. B. COGSWELL, President.
HOWARD F. HILL,
Corresponding Secretary.

Hon. W. B. SMALL.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. At the outset of this debate it was not my intention to occupy the attention of the House on this question for more than ten or fifteen minutes. I know the House is already wearied with the discussion of the measure and is prepared to vote. But, sir, this debate has been permitted to wander outside of the question at issue before the House, and other matters have been brought in for consideration that I deem it my duty to some extent, and in my own humble way, to reply to.

I listened last night, sir, to the able, the witty, the pungent, and the cogent speech of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS.] He opened his remarks by lecturing this House on that question of questions—economy. He said he came here on the 1st December last prepared to carry out what he supposed to be the instructions of the country, to economize in every particular, and that the very first proposition almost that was moved was on the part of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DONNAN,] the chairman of the Committee on Printing, asking for the publication of two hundred and fifty thousand Agricultural Reports. This proposition carried itself right to his sensitive heart, and he lost confidence in the Congress of the United States from that moment forward. It was of course not concealed from his observation and mine that this Congress within six or seven weeks after its assembling had repealed what is known as the "salary grab," and had thereby saved the Government upward of $1,000,000. Yet he was sensitive over the fact that this House, so far as it is concerned, had almost unanimously authorized the publication of two hundred and fifty thousand Agricultural Reports. He lost confidence in the House. He was cognizant of the fact, as well as myself, that the House had passed the Army appropriation bill, making a reduction of millions from that of the year preceding it. Yet, because of this act, he lost confidence in this House. The fact was patent that the naval appropriation bill which has gone through this House was a reduction on any former appropriation for the Navy for a series of years; and yet he lost confidence because of the two hundred and fifty thousand Agricultural Reports.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to that, he was cognizant of the fact that under the leadership of those able gentlemen upon this floor, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the respective Departments had been called upon to revise their respective lists of estimates for appropriations for the current year, and had done so at a reduction of millions from their former estimates. And yet he lost confidence. Why? Because, forsooth, two hundred and fifty thousand agricultural documents of 1872 had been ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker, I have been unable to see in the proceedings of this Congress anything that warrants the assumption that this Congress is not economical, and almost niggardly, in its appropriations for carrying on the affairs of the Government.

After such a lecture, it was but a step for the gentleman to descend to a discussion of the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] and to refer, perhaps with a somewhat patronizing air, questionable in taste at least, to the fact that he had spoken words here fresh with aroma of the prairies, and done it with an untutored eloquence. That was all true. Yet that grand and magnificent effort of my colleague upon the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, I apprehend will be read with as much avidity by his constituents and by my constituents, and the constituents that are found in the prairies and the woodlands of the country, as even the delectable and facetious remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey.

But, sir, in traveling over this question the gentleman from New Jersey has seen fit to admit even that these documents have been called for from his district. And he has given us a disquisition upon geological questions that is, to say the least, amusing. He has traveled through with his constituents from the paleozoic period to the mesozoic period, and has even got down with his constituents to the crustaceous period in the mesozoic age. And it is a most remarkable progress that I commend to the gentleman that he has but one more great period in geology to pass through with before his constituents in New Jersey will have reached the Adamitic age, or the age of the mind. It is something which will undoubtedly be a consolation to him on his dying bed to remember the fact that in something like a hundred thousand years from this time the citizens of Bergen, Morris, and Passaic Counties, New Jersey, will have reached the mammal grade of life and be up with the rest of the country, and then probably want other documents than geological and preadamite. I congratulate the gentleman upon his near arrival to our age.

At the same time he says that while he gets letters for these books upon geological questions, he also gets letters asking for the loan of five dollars. Of course it is not applicable in this instance, but it may be that this lesson may have been taught by the instructions given at the ides of November. And then the gentleman traveled somewhat out of the record to use this language relative to the vast army of constituents of many of us upon this floor:

> Just here again I strike squarely against and take issue with the gentleman from Illinois. I am not a granger, and I do not want to give them what they want. I say it very boldly. [Laughter.] I do not like granger principles. The grangers did not nominate me; the grangers did not vote for me. The republican party nominated me; the republican party voted for me, and I can know no other. I shall be loyal to the sentiments of the republican party ever; I shall stand by the principles which the republican party has declared ever, and I shall yield my loyalty to the republican party, and give in my fealty to this new party of the grangers, never, never—unless they should happen to establish granges in the northern part of New Jersey.

But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman, in his somewhat uncalled-for attack upon our western sovereigns, has been pleased to invoke the aid of holy writ. Like Jeshurun, he says, the people have "waxed fat, and kicked." The figure is to some extent a two-edged weapon. I trust he will follow it to the end. Like Jeshurun, too, the people are upright; I beg him to remember the definition of the term; and for them as well as for Jacob and Jeshurun were spoken the sublime words of the poet-prophet Isaiah: "Fear not, O Jacob, my servant, and thou, O Jeshurun, whom I have chosen." Fear not, O grangers, my servants, and ye, O people, whom I have chosen. Chosen for what, does the gentleman ask? Chosen to be the sovereigns of the mightiest republic of earth. Chosen to demonstrate the grand truth that in one land at least "a man is a man for a' that, and a' that and a' that."

But, Mr. Speaker, I am not done with the Scriptures yet. Leaving the musty promises of the old law, will the gentleman go with me into the new, ay, to the very presence of the Lord and Master Himself, and with bated breath read this other lesson that we all should know? It is in these words:

> And, behold, one came and said unto Him, Good Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life? And He said unto him, Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one, that is, God: but if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. He saith unto Him, Which? Jesus said, Thou shalt do no murder, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Honor thy father and thy mother, and, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. The young man saith unto Him, All these things have I kept from my youth up.

I have no question that that assertion of the young man in Scripture applies to other young men now in this age, and it may be upon this floor.

> What lack I yet?
> Jesus said unto him, If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shall have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me.
> But when the young man heard that saying, he went away sorrowful: for he had great possessions.
> Then said Jesus unto his disciples, Verily I say unto you, that a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven.
> And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. (Matthew, xix, 20–24.)

And as he did so he probably took from his desk the Congressional Directory of that year, and read the young man's inventory, as follows:

> William Walter Dives, of Tanglewood, beyond Jordah, was born at Jerusalem, anno Domini 12; was a graduate at the college of Samaria called Yale, in the year 31, with high honors; afterward he pursued his studies in Europe, and later at the law school of Gamaliel of Jerusalem, where he received the valedictory appointment of his class; then entered immediately upon the practice of the law; he is a director of the National City Bank and Second National Bank of Jerusalem, the Herod Trust Company and Farmers' Loan and Trust Company; also in the following railroad companies, (supposed to be horse railroads:) Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, Oswego and Syracuse, Syracuse and Bethlehem, Cayuga and Gennesaret, International of Judea, Jaffa and Great Northern, New Nineveh and Babylon, Morris and Essex, and others.

And I suppose that the word "others," used in that ancient Congressional Directory, as read at that time, was in fact like the act which crowned the life of Samson, "greater than all that preceded it." Now, I do not pretend to say, turning to page 41 of the Congressional Directory of this Congress, that there is any analogy between the young man referred to in the Scriptures, who "went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions," and the gentleman whose history is recorded here in the Congressional Directory; yet there are those who will harbor the ungenerous thought when they read it in these words:

> WILLIAM WALTER PHELPS, of Englewood, was born at New York, August 24, 1839; was graduated at Yale College in 1860, with high honors; afterwards he pursued his studies in Europe, and later at Columbia College Law School, of New York, where he received the valedictory appointment of his class; then entered immediately upon the practice of law; he is a director of the National City Bank and Second National Bank of New York, the United States Trust Company, and Farmers' Loan and Trust Company; also in the following railroad companies, namely: Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, Oswego and Syracuse, Syracuse and Binghamton, Cayuga and Susquehanna, International of Texas, Houston and Great Northern, New Haven and Northampton, Morris and Essex, and others; he was elected Fellow of Yale College in July, 1872, and was elected to the Forty-third Congress by a vote of 12,701 against 9,986 votes for A. B. Woodruff.

Certain it is, Mr. Speaker, that there is a remarkable analogy between the history of the young man as detailed by the Divine Master and read in the Congressional Directory of that period—the young man who went out sorrowful from the presence of the Mighty Lord—and the gentleman from New Jersey, who last night threw himself in the teeth of the granger element of the country and defied it. Let us hope that their ends may not be the same.

Mr. Speaker, I think it was a most extraordinary exposition that we saw upon this floor yesterday afternoon. It is a glorious era in the history of the country when a man can stand here and say, and the declaration is not particularly applauded, that he is the apologist and advocate of the grasping corporations in this country. I say this as one who represents a constituency that is loyal and true, and is, in addition to that, subject to the anathema of the gentleman from New Jersey; for they are grangers. Perhaps in a few years more the truth may dawn in this House, as it is dawning in the country, that the people's interests have now the front; and as that shall appear, let us hope that more and more it will be popular here to be their friend, and by consequence more and more it will be unpopular to be the reverse. Then shall such a speech as the gentleman from New Jersey delivered receive less applause for its sentiment, while its wit will ever elicit admiration.

Mr. PHELPS. I would not interrupt the gentleman but for the fact that he gives me the credit of speaking well of railways, express companies, banks, manufactories, and other forms of industry which are developing the resources of the country. Anticipating the possibility of such a misunderstanding, I stated my position explicitly yesterday; and no man on this floor can go further than I did in heaping every possible abuse upon railways and express companies, which I said had no rights we were bound to respect. I interrupt the gentleman now only to say that after I labored so hard to be clear, it is exceedingly unfair that he should charge me with standing up here as the apologist of the railways, of which I distinctly declared myself the opponent.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. The gentleman says he is their opponent; yet at the same time he thanks me for calling the attention of the House and the country to the fact that he was and is the friend of the railways and express companies and the monopolists of the land.

Mr. PHELPS. When did I say that?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Just now, as I understood the gentleman, Mr. Speaker. I certainly intended not to misstate the gentleman's position. I honor him for standing by his own, as I stand by mine. I honor him for standing here in bold and manly style and saying that he is the friend of the railroads and the grasping corporations of this country. I do not particularly honor him for coming here and saying that this bill proposes to raise in this country a privileged class, when, as the apologist and advocate of these railroads and other monopolies, he knows that there is but one class in this country that is more especially a privileged class than any other. Who, I ask the gentleman from New Jersey, have whole States and Territories of the public land by virtue of the bounty of the Government, and have made untold wealth out of the public domain, but the railroads? Who have increased the national debt, by special grants from Congress, to the amount of hundreds of millions, except the railroads? It certainly ill becomes them to speak of privileged classes in this country. What farmer is not, by his sweat, paying a portion of the interest upon these bonds by way of taxation? And now that he wants the miserable pittance of an Agricultural Report now and then from his Congressman, why does the gentleman, in the interest of his friends, deny him so small a request?

But, Mr. Speaker, let me say that the man who sits in his satin slippers in silken chairs in Washington, Boston, or New York, heedless of the muttering thunders of those distant prairies, is mistaken if he supposes the sound is not the sure precursor of the coming storm. Those grangers, let me tell the gentleman, mean business. They are scattered all over the valleys and hill-sides of the Mississippi. They are the movable force of twenty million people. Against their cry for fair play and justice it is foolish and unwise for you to array the Philadelphia or any other platform. They will have justice, inside the republican party if they can; outside if they must. They have determined that the winter's fire which warms their wives and babes shall be fed by other fuel than corn hereafter. As their own strong arms and brave hearts carried the flag of their country in the face of the bravest of foes to the Gulf, and left the waters of their great river unvexed from its source to the sea, so they mean that in like manner their commerce shall go out unvexed by sand-bars and obstructions. They mean that the public domain shall be carved into free homes for freemen. They mean to give the railroads exactly what is nominated in the bonds which invest them with empires of public land; they do not mean to give them more. They want money in exchange for their products. They want a chance to live with you. They want the blessings of the Government they helped to save to fall equally upon all. I want them to have it; the gentleman is willing they shall have it, if it is found in the Philadelphia platform. They ask for bread, and he gives them a stone. I like their principles; he does not. I am a republican in the loftiest sense, believing in progress and reform. If I judge him rightly, he is not.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am dwelling too long upon this subject. The great reason in my opinion why this measure ought to pass is because it is demanded by the people, and because, in addition to that, it is opposed by those instrumentalities upon this floor which, it cannot have escaped observation, (and this is my sole reason for calling attention to the gentleman's inventory supplied by himself,) are certainly not in the interest of the people in the highest sense.

Sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] who on every occasion upon this floor speaks with wisdom, and whose words ever meet with respect, in a speech which he delivered during the Forty-second Congress, struck, in my judgment, the key-note of this whole matter. He said that this Government was not like the government of Great Britain or of any other country on the face of the earth; that the Government of the United States had its foundation upon the intelligence of the people, who are its sovereigns. One hundred families, he said, constitute the ruling class in England. The younger sons of the nobility, with long lines of stocks, with a long list of directories to which they are attached, form the English House of Commons. In this country it is reserved for one even as poor and humble as myself, by energy and devotion of purpose, to have the privilege of standing as a member in this the mightiest forum on earth.

Such is the character of this Government, and we have the right, Mr. Speaker, to be judged, as we are in this forum; we have the right, and the people have the right, to know the words which fall from our lips, and the votes we here give as their representatives. How is it to be done? Take up the metropolitan press, if you please, which make reports of our speeches here, and tell me if there is any man on this floor who would for a moment stand by the record these papers would make for him? If there is no other opportunity to be known to the country except through the reporters' gallery, then indeed the source of power is not upon this floor or with the people, but it emanates from that body of men who sit in the reporters' gallery and record our proceedings. They are in reality, then, the Government.

But, sir, such ought not to be the fact. It is due to us, it is due to the country, and to the press, that it should be otherwise. Let us have free and unobstructed lines of travel between the people and their creature, the Government. Let there be no toll-gates in these highways. It will be better for us in such an event; better for all. For this reason chiefly I give this bill my heartiest support.

One moment more, Mr. Speaker, for I have occupied more time than I intended. Of the Agricultural Report of 1872 there were published nine copies each for the Senate, and three each for the members of the House, of the Forty-second Congress. Let me call the attention of the House to the table of contents of that book, and let us see for a moment whether there ought not to be an additional number sent broadcast throughout the land for the people.

This is the book, mark you, the publication of two hundred and fifty thousand copies of which, ordered by the House, so dampened the spirit of the gentleman from New Jersey, and bereft him of confidence in this Congress.

First is the report of the Commissioner; then report of the statistician; report of the entomologist; report of the chemist; report of the botanist; reclamation of waste lands; microscopic investigations; influenza in horses; fish culture; a hundred years' progress; silk cultivation; forest cultivation on the plains; city milk supply; progress of industrial education; recent rural publications; tests of Department seeds; organization of swine-breeding; recent facts, (agricultural;) farm experiments. Digests of State reports of Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, Missouri, New Hampshire, Ohio. Donations to the museum; and finally the index.

If this book is of no value to the country, then let the Agricultural Department be abolished; if it be what its contents purport, its value is great and it ought to reach the people.

Let the House and the country look to another fact. You appropriate $30,000,000 to the War Department, you appropriate $29,000,000 to the Post-Office Department, and you appropriate the miserably pitiful sum of $200,000 to the Agricultural Department. Contrast the facts these figures present. Have the grangers no reason to complain at this view? Ought not Congress to look to this? Perhaps even here may be found a little of the ground-work of that popular uprising in the West which the gentleman does not like.

Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. PHELPS. Does not my friend from Kansas think it proper to yield ten or fifteen minutes to me, by which I may obtain the ear of the House and plead guilty or not guilty to his terrible indictment?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I have yielded ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD,] who now holds the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. Is there no method, Mr. Speaker, by which the House can give me an opportunity to answer to the indictment which the gentleman from Kansas makes against me of high crimes and misdemeanors?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I can arrange my time, I think, so as to give the gentleman five minutes, and I hope the House will give him a longer time.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I will be glad to see the gentleman from New Jersey obtain the floor, but of the little time accorded me I have no right to give any away.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move that the gentleman from New Jersey be allowed ten minutes—not to come out of the time yielded to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. ATKINS. I object to any arrangement of that kind unless the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COBB] can be allowed to reply.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BURROWS in the chair.) The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] is entitled to the floor for ten minutes.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. As I will vote against this bill, and as I entertain high respect for this committee, and especially for my colleague, who is a member of it, I desire to state the reasons for my action. I felt at the time of the repeal of the franking privilege that perhaps it was to some extent a mistake. I had never exercised it. I did not know fully about it; and I did not care to inquire. At what I deemed to be the behest of the people, Congress saw fit to repeal it. Now, I only speak, and intend only to speak, with reference to what appeared to me to be the wishes of the people upon this subject. Whether or not it is a desirable privilege to be extended to members of Congress I will not inquire.

The convention of the republican party declared for its repeal; the conventions which nominated most, or at least many, of the members upon this floor declared for its repeal. In obedience to that expression of opinion the law was repealed. I have listened to the arguments we have heard here with interest. I have been almost convinced at times that it would be a proper thing to restore it. But I have not heard yet that any considerable body of men, even the grangers or any others that have been referred to, or any considerable portion of the people in convention or public meeting assembled, have demanded its restoration. The abuses which were complained of, and finally procured the repeal of the law, are, in my judgment, entirely owing to the kind of frank which it is proposed here to restore. I believe that the loading of the mails with the free documents now proposed to be sent free through them produced that condition of public opinion which demanded the repeal of the law.

Now, sir, until I am satisfied that the people who asked its repeal demand its restoration I am bound to vote against this bill. That is substantially or very nearly all I care or desire to say. I have prepared, for the purpose of being read at the proper time, an important amendment, and after a word with reference to that I am done.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by inserting after the word "thereof," in the sixth line of section 1, the following words: "Including the printed speeches of members of Congress and Senators made in either House thereof, whether printed by authority of Congress or not."

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I offer that amendment without being open to the charge of desiring or reckoning to spread my own speeches abroad in the land. I have never made any here; and I do not imagine I ever will. After the results I have seen befall those who have made speeches, I rather quail before the attempt. [Laughter.] But I do desire the privilege to be restored of sending speeches of members of Congress, whether printed by the House or not. It appears to me that one of the things the people desire to understand is what we say here, as much as what other people say in many of those books we will distribute under this bill. I am not open to the charge of selfishness in offering this. But while I shall vote against the bill and all its amendments, I hope, if it pass at all, that this one which I have read will be incorporated. I do not like this unjust discrimination against the speeches printed in a little better style in a private office in favor of those printed in the Government Printing Office. I do not think the people want it; and I do think that speeches of members of Congress delivered here are as important to the members—I do not know how it is to the people—as any document that will be distributed under the frank, if we restore it in the manner proposed by this bill.

I yield the balance of my time, if I have any left, back to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. COBB,] who courteously yielded the floor to me.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS.]

Mr. PHELPS. I do not want to make any speech. I only want to say something. [Laughter.] I confess to trouble in deciding in what manner I shall answer the indictment which has been so suddenly and unexpectedly entered. First, to avoid any misconception, I want to say that I have not the slightest feeling of anger at my friend from Kansas [Mr. COBB] for the course he has seen fit to pursue. Indeed, I feel grateful to him for one result. Yesterday I thought that it was wrong to vote for re-establishing the franking privilege. But his remarks were so pertinent and close to the merits of the bill under discussion that I acknowledge conviction.

I had not the good fortune to be in the House at the opening of the gentleman's remarks; fortunately I heard the middle and the end. I hope I shall not dwell on the personalities in them further than to make one or two necessary corrections. He tried to thrust upon me some issues for which I am not responsible, and which lie between this House and myself. These I must correct.

It is not true that I spoke disrespectfully of this House. It is not true that I entertained any but the highest regards for its members. And it is wrong in my friend from Kansas to drag in a foreign issue.

Did I violate any proper rule of criticism in saying that in my opinion—an opinion which I share with many others—this House had not displayed during this session that practical interest in economy which the country expected, and which the necessity of the Treasury required? It was proper criticism, and it is the truth.

But the gentleman has made personal charges to which I must plead guilty. He has found the facts and read them from the Congressional Directory. With the propriety of the method in which he conducted that portion of his argument I find no fault. If it suits him it suits me. As to the facts which he has exhibited to this House, they are correct. I have been unfortunate enough by hard work, industry, and a moderate amount of honesty, to have secured the positions he mentions. They involve a deal of labor, a deal of care, a deal of responsibility, and if any man envies me therefor I pity him. I will cheerfully yield the positions if he will assume the care. Yes, I am guilty.

But why did not the gentleman, when he was presenting this record to the House, say something like this: "It is a disgrace to this member of the House that he has secured these positions. It is a disgrace to this member that widows and orphans have been willing to trust him with their funds. It is a disgrace that in my State and other States he buried his money in railways which have made the country rich and which have left him poor. But it is proper for me to say that while he has done all these disgraceful acts, still, when the people of his district chose to sendhim here to represent them, he announced publicly his misfortune. It is a redeeming feature in his case that he said, in effect, "ThoughI have done wrong, though I have accumulated wealth, though I have aided where I could the developing of distant parts of the country, yet still, knowing the disgrace of such conduct, and unwillingthat any man here should suppose that my acts are influenced by interests which the House assumes but does not know, I will send to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an extract from the New Jersey Manual, which will give to all this damning record of my past." My friend from Kansas might at least have done me this justice.

Sir, if it be disgraceful to be a director of trust companies and of banks; if it be a disgrace to be a director of railroad and express companies; if it be wicked and contrary to the spirit of American institutions that I should endeavor by thrift and honesty to accumulate that property for which others toil, yet I take this credit, that I made a clean breast of it. Did I not, in anticipation of the polite curiosity that might introduce a resolution of inquiry, boldly and voluntarily go upon the record? Give me credit at least for ingenuousness, at least for frankness, at least for fair dealing, when I allowed this CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which goes upon the desk of every member here, to declare that I was a pariah, whom every man might kick; a leper stained with the leprosy of wealth, whom no man should speak to. This I can bear—it is my fate. But one thing he said deeply pained me. He thought I made sport of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.] My friend from Illinois himself knows better. The gentleman from Kansas thought I insulted the gentleman from Illinois, when I claimed that his eloquence was untutored. Mr. Speaker, that eloquence which is not derived from schools, which comes directly from the heart, is a nobler eloquence than any which my friend from Kansas gained when in the dark days of his disgrace he entered the "freshman and sophomore classes of Beloit and graduated at Brown;" and I will acknowledge to the House that it is better to speak for the interest of those who live upon the prairies, as did my friend from Illinois, than it is to speak for one's own popularity with the grangers, or to paint pictures of Zenxis and Apelles, who, for all I know, are the chiefs of the grangers. [Laughter.] If I called the eloquence of my friend from Illinois "untutored," I so called it because he called it "untutored" himself. And if I praised him, I praised him honestly, for the sincerity which I recognized in every single word that he said. I trust that my friend from Illinois knows me well enough to know that this apology was not needed by him, but is made to this House lest they might be misled by the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas.

A friend suggests to me that it might be proper to review the record of the gentleman from Kansas. Take the book; read the record. I admit, without one feeling of disappointment, that in that record I find nothing which is not creditable. I find nothing to censure, except that he endeavored to obtain at the universities that education which has enabled him to speak so forcibly here. Aside from that, nothing of which he need be ashamed. I find that instead of wasting his time in increasing the material interests of this country, instead of building railroads or establishing banks or doing anything of that disreputable, but humble and useful kind, wiser than I, he preferred as a non-producer, continually to feed at different corners of the public crib. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] has expired.

Several MEMBERS. Let him go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the gentleman will proceed. The Chair hears none.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman's record, therefore, was different from mine. I earned my own support; he took his from the people. I labored in every way to accumulate that material wealth which is the secret of a new country's development and growth; he chose, as a politic way, to use in a proper way the wealth which others had acquired. Now, mark you, Mr. Speaker, I could run on some time in this strain; but that would be just as unfair to him as he was to me; for really it is no disgrace to me that, having a taste for material interests, I chose to labor for the development of the country; neither is it any disgrace to him that, having a taste and capacity for public life, he went into it, and from his majority held office. And, sir, had I been as successful as he has been, up to the present time, in receiving the honors of my party, I fear that like him I would never hesitate on any occasion, at any risk of good sense, of good breeding, of politeness—nothing should forbid me—to seize every opportunity, whether fair or unfair, to speak as I thought would please my people, though to do it I had to twist the eternal rules of truth, and make the wrong appear the better reason.

Mr. Speaker, I regret I have occupied at all the time of this House. I did not wish to speak; but it seemed to me that, after an assault which was so directly personal, I should seize the opportunity of stating what I have endeavored to say in an inconsequential way.

It is true that I have wealth—I beg pardon, Mr. Speaker; that expression only shows that there is no proposition which a man can state absolutely. Before the panic it might have been well said that I could support myself and my family without the daily toil of the laborer, or the salary of the office-holder. But that panic, which was the result of paper money—I am glad to get in one good point in this wretched mess of personalities, [laughter]—that panic, the result of an issue of irredeemable currency, did so injure me that I would be to-day willing to compare my possessions with those of my friend from Kansas; and upon such a comparison, he counting the money which he had got from the people, and I deducting the money which I had lost in Kansas railways, I am pretty sure he would find that, standing here to-day, he is a richer man than I. And the only bitterness I feel on this occasion is, that in these very railways in which I have made investments, and which pass mostly through the Western States, I have lost a great part of the fortune for the possession of which I am taunted.

My friend from Illinois, in his remarks, rather implied that I was a railway man, and therefore hostile to the prairies. Is it improper to say that through his own prairies, through his towns of Urbana and Champaign, there was a railroad built in which I was interested? It raised the value of those prairies at least 100 per cent., and caused the growth of little cities all along its line. So his district gained by my railway; and as yet I have not got, and see no chance of getting back, my money. Yet these representatives of the "grangers," who have got our eastern money and kept it, who have received from us these railways and given us nothing in return except a series of hopeless investments, stand up here in holy horror and declare that we shall not be allowed to speak on this matter, because we lost our money in the West. Under these circumstances, is it fair for my friend from Kansas to take eastern money, use it in his railways, grow rich upon the proceeds of it, and then taunt us because we were foolish enough to go to Kansas and invest it?

If I am forced to speak of these railways, I think I may safely say that if my friend will look all through the disgraceful record of railways with which I am connected, there will not be found (unless I am deceived) one that ever received or ever asked aid from this Government, either in the way of money subsidy or land gratuity. I am a representative of New Jersey. I have acquired wealth, and spent it in Kansas, in Illinois, and in Texas, getting from it, in many cases, no return; getting from it in no case returns until long years have passed. Shall I for these reasons be prevented from speaking in this House what I may think with reference to the merits of the great questions which are brought before us? If my own modesty or the fear of the grangers should counsel silence, there is that in my representative position here which forbids me; and so long as the farmers of New Jersey send a man so stained with the achievements of honest industry to represent them on this floor, I shall, whether I am to be followed the next morning by my friend from Kansas or not, speak in the interests of the people as I understand those interests; speak for the welfare of the whole country as I understand its welfare; and no taunt of this kind from any source shall ever prevent me from meeting promptly every charge which may be hurled against me here or elsewhere.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I want to say to the gentleman from New Jersey that I never intended to arraign him in the slightest degree because he held those positions. I honor him for what he acquired; I honor him for his ability displayed upon this floor; I honor him for his general ability and for his distinction as a man. No man on this floor goes before me in respect for the gentleman from New Jersey; but I called attention to a fact, which I believed I had the right to do; and when I saw the representative of an enormous number of these corporations rising upon this floor and arraigning the grangers of the West I thought it my duty to myself and to my constituents to say that he ought not to do it. I did it without intending any insult and without intending any offense at all to the gentleman from New Jersey.

I now yield the remaining portion of my time to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.]

Mr. COBURN. Mr. Speaker, I have not much to say on this question; but having voted for the repeal of the franking privilege, and intending now to vote for what some wrongly term a restoration of the franking privilege, I desire to define my position. When the law which provided for the franking privilege was repealed, it was well understood in Congress, by the Postmaster-General and by all interested, that some provision should be made for the free transmission of public documents. I think no majority could have been obtained in either House of Congress without an express understanding that some measure like this for free transmission of public documents would be inaugurated and pushed to its passage. I remember very well the feeling of disappointment which prevailed in the House, and which I think in a degree prevailed in the country, when no provision was made for the free transmission of documents by the last Congress.

And now the argument is shoved upon us that we must not pass this measure because we are acting inconsistently. So far as I am concerned, I know of no inconsistency in thus providing for the free transmission of documents published at the expense of the Government, but rather consistency, in breaking down whatever there was that was personal, and in restoring whatever there was that was general and public in its nature in free mails.

We have erected, Mr. Speaker, an immense printing establishment here in the city of Washington, and the very object of that establishment was to give the people promptly, at a cheap rate, these public documents. Now, are we prepared to abandon that method of printing to-day—a method without a rival on earth? Are we prepared to give up the printing of the reports of the various Departments of the Government? If we are prepared to abandon it entirely, then let us abolish free mails.

I propose to show the House by a few facts that we will not save anything by not providing for the free circulation of documents if we continue to print them. In the first place, we save nothing at all so far as mail contracts are concerned. The best evidence shows that fact; and I am convinced, from the investigation of men who have devoted much time to this subject, that mail contracts in the main will be about the same whether we have a free transmission of documents or not. In other words, the free matter going out from here is so small compared with the great amount of matter going through the mails that it does not enter into the calculation of mail contractors when they put in their bids. Then, where can we save money? Where can economy step in? In no other place than the printing office. I propose to call the attention of the members to what we do print and what it costs, to see whether all this talk in this business about saving money to the Government, about economy in the expenditures and advantage to the people, amounts to anything.

I have in my hand a statement from the Public Printer, made within two months, going to show the whole expense for the printing of all the documents furnished Congress during the past year. The amount is $518,394.12; and that includes all documents for the last Congress. Some of them were census reports which cost about $153,000. So, then, the reports of the last Congress cost not very much over $350,000. It is true, the public printing and binding cost about $2,000,000; but that which we are proposing to do away with, if we prevent the printing of every single book here, would save to the Government only about $350,000, even if we refused to print every document. No man proposes to abolish printing entirely. Nobody proposes to do away with the printing of these public documents. No man is insane enough to say we shall not publish the reports of officers of the working of their Departments—the operations of this Government. To do so would be barbarism; would be suicide, would be madness. We cannot, then, cut off anything except some of these Agricultural Reports, and a few of the messages and documents, in order that we may furnish the people the smallest modicum of information in reference to the workings of the Government. And who is prepared to give up the Agricultural Reports?

The letter of the Congressional Printer is a follows, and shows that there have been the grossest errors among well-informed men as to the amount of documental printing, and demonstrates very clearly that three-fourths of the expenses of the Public Printing Office are due to the business of the Departments, they being furnished entirely in books, records, blanks, and documents from this office, commanding three-fourths of its time:

To the Editor of the New York Times:

The country at this exciting juncture is being startled by the oft-repeated announcement that the printing and binding for the Government cost annually about $2,000,000. This seems to be a vast sum of money; but when it is correctly understood what this expenditure covers there is nothing very surprising or alarming in the proclamation, be it reiterated ever so often. My attention has been called to this subject more especially by the appearance in the Times of a recent private letter from Speaker BLAINE to a friend in your city, and which you published on the 25th instant, attended by a carefully written editorial under the caption of "Public Printing," in which the following erroneous paragraph occurs:

"The public printing has cost the Government about $2,000,000 per annum, and the greater part of this vast sum has been expended for public documents, which have gone through the mails free."

When you become correctly informed on this point you will see that in making this statement you have been betrayed into a grave error of fact. The truth does not justify it; and as a high-toned public journal, which seeks to enlighten rather than to mislead the popular judgment, I feel convinced that you will correct the error when the facts are clearly presented. You are correct in the abstract statement that "the public printing" (you should have included the public binding) "has cost the Government about $2,000,000 per annum;" but it is an error to state that "the greater part of this vast sum has been expended for public documents which have gone through the mails free."

The appropriation for the printing and binding for the Government for several years has been about $2,000,000 per annum. During the last year, ending September 30, the amount expended for printing and binding for Congress was $874,998.27; for all the Executive Departments, including the Judiciary and the Government Printing Office, it was $1,218,239.77.

It is but truth to state that the printing and binding for the Executive and Judicial Departments include all the blanks, blank-books, &c., required for the business of the Government here and elsewhere throughout the country.

The State Department supplies its own office, the offices of all foreign ministers and consulates, as well as its foreign conventions, for the making of treaties, with the blanks, circulars, blank-books, &c., for the transaction of its business, through this office.

The Treasury Department supplies its own needs and all the custom-houses, internal-revenue offices, the Light-House Board, the Comptroller of the Currency, all its Auditors, the First and Second Comptrollers, its assistant treasuries and depositories in your city and elsewhere throughout the nation, the Bureau of Statistics, the Coast Survey, and the Supervising Architect with all the printing, binding, the blanks and blank-books, &c., necessary to conduct the business of the Government relating to itself throughout the country; and all from this office.

The Interior Department looks to this office for all the printing and binding, blanks, blank-books, &c., for its own necessities, for the Commissioner of Pensions, the Commissioner of Patents, the Commissioner of the Land Office, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Superintendent of the Census, and the Commissioner of Education.

The War Department provides through this office all the printing, binding, blank-books, blanks, orders, &c., for the office of its Secretary, the Adjutant-General, the Quartermaster-General, the Commissary-General, the Surgeon-General, the Paymaster-General, the Chief of Engineers, and the Bureau of Ordnance; and, through these, all the military depots, forts, and garrisons in the Union are supplied with blanks, blank-books, &c.

The Navy Department supplies the office of its Secretary, the Bureaus of Equipment and Recruiting, of Provisions and Clothing, of Yards and Docks, of Construction and Repair, of Steam Engineering, of Medicine and Surgery, of Ordnance, and of Navigation, with all the printing and binding, blanks, blank-books, &c., necessary for the transaction of its business, through the Government Printing Office.

The Judiciary, including the Supreme Court of the United States, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the Court of Claims, the Department of Justice, the office of the Attorney-General, and the Metropolitan police board, are provided with all their printing and binding through this office.

The Post-Office Department supplies all the post-offices and all the money-order offices in the United States (the blank money orders alone forming a very important item in the business of this office) with all the blanks, blank-books, and other printing and binding necessary to the proper discharge of their duties, under the annual appropriations made for the public printing and binding.

The Department of Agriculture, also, is supplied with all its printing and binding from this office.

All experience clearly establishes the fact that these supplies have cost vastly more money to the Government under the former practice of procuring them from private establishments than under the present system, in which the Government is its own printer and binder. As a measure of economy, there is no doubt that the law which provides that all printing and binding for the Government shall be done at its printing office is fraught with beneficial results. It is my present purpose, however, more especially to present to the public mind some idea of the extent and character of the printing and binding required by the Government in all its departments, and which is covered by the annual appropriations made for that purpose.

It is apparent from the records of this office that the greater part of the $2,000,000 appropriated for the public printing and binding is absorbed by the Executive Departments of the Government, instead of being, as is stated in the paragraph quoted above, "expended for public documents which have gone through the mails free."

From a careful examination and analysis of the books of this office, it appears that of the $874,998.27 expended in 1873 for all the printing and binding for Congress, the amount absolutely used for the printing and binding of extra numbers of documents "which have gone through the mails free" is $518,394.12, which, instead of being the greater part of the $2,000,000 appropriated and expended for the public printing and binding, is really only about one-fourth of the entire amount. Of the above amount, $153,751.84 has been expended for the census of 1870.

In this connection it is proper to state that the law requires a given number of all documents, (1,675,) known as "usual number," to be printed for the use of Congress, only a portion of which are bound, as what is called the reserve, and that the printing of these carries with it the full expense of the composition therefor. The expense of extra numbers, which have been printed under resolution alone, for free distribution, and have "gone through the mails free," is only for the paper, press-work, and binding involved, the composition being charged against the "usual number," which are printed in accordance with a long-standing statute.

I have attempted, as briefly as possible, to present this question of the public printing in a plain, practical light, that errors may be corrected, and a better understanding of it may enter the public mind.

A. M. CLAPP,
Congressional Printer.

OFFICE OF THE CONGRESSIONAL PRINTER,
Washington, December 27, 1873.

Here, then, is the cost of printing, less than a thousand dollars' worth to each member of the House and Senate, to be by them delivered to their constituents, and containing the exact position, undeniable evidence, and account of the operations of the Government to be found nowhere else, and if not printed to be obtained neither for money nor by favor.

I now propose to show that with but one or two exceptions these reports are now, and have been, published in scanty and inadequate numbers; that the great departmental reports are furnished in meager quantities to members, totally insufficient for the needs of an intelligent self-governing society, totally out of proportion to the vast interests concerned, and the enormous responsibilities assumed by the servants of the people.

Let me call attention to the number of documents that are distributed, and the average postage on each for four years:

The first thing is seven hundred Agricultural Reports. Well, sir, that may be too large for a stingy man, and I will let that pass for the present. The next is ninety-five of the Abridged Message and Documents, and these will not supply the newspapers and public libraries of an average district, much less the citizens. The list that follows grows rapidly less and less. It will not furnish your district newspaper editors alone with a single copy of many of these important documents, There are twenty-three of the Commerce and Navigation Reports. Put your libraries and newspapers together, and how can you distribute that number, giving one to each? Yet that is all you get. That is as far as it goes, after all this great hubbub about free documents, this wasteful supply. Next there are five of the Coast Survey Report. How far will that go? Where does the extravagance appear? There are eleven of Commercial Relations. Why, sir, that will not go round the public libraries in my district. Then there are thirty-two of the Educational Reports, a most important document. That will not reach one teacher in ten in my district. There are seven of the Finance Report. Why, sir, that does not cover a hundredth part of your business houses, banks, corporations, moneyed institutions. Next, there are twenty-four sets of the Globe. Then there are twenty-five of Hayden's Survey—that survey of the Western Territories which every man, East and West, whether he has hay-seed in his hair or not, wants to know something about—a document for the pioneer, the poor man and the capitalist. Next, there are twenty of the Land Office Report. That will not supply the professional men who want it, much less those who want to go West and grow up. Next there are fourteen reports on the Mineral Resources—not one-quarter enough. Seven of the Postmaster-General's Report; seven of the report of the Secretary of War; seven of the Secretary of the Navy; seven of the Secretary of the Interior. What an astounding piece of extravagance it is to give each district seven of these reports and fourteen of the Secretary of State! Eighteen reports of the Smithsonian Institution; ten of the Directories; thirty-five of the Laws of Congress, and five reports of the Signal Office. The wonder is the people do not clamor for more. These invaluable documents for the facts and statistics they contain are thus sparsely sprinkled over the land.

Now, sir, I have gone through all the regular reports. Go down to your folding-room, and if you can find one other that comes out regularly I will make the correction. We had the Census Reports last year; but that is only once in ten years. We had the Credit Mobilier report; I hope this will be but once in a thousand years. We had the Ku-Klux report; but I think the parallel of the Ku-Klux, as it never was in the world before, never will be again. So we will have no trouble with that.

You will see then, Mr. Speaker, that what we are sending is but a drop in the bucket. It costs little or nothing for postage at the present rates. Why, sir, what does it cost? But $465 for each district, take the United States over. Are you going to save money in that way? Send all these documents, seven hundred Agricultural Reports, ninety-five of the Abridged Message and Documents, and all the rest, and it costs each district on the average in the United States but $465.

Mr. BURCHARD. For postage?

Mr. COBURN. Yes; but you will not save that. By keeping up this charge of postage you will not put that amount in the Treasury. How will these documents be carried? They will be carried as freight. The railroad companies will get the money; not the Government.

Mr. BURCHARD. That is it, exactly.

Mr. COBURN. They will be carried as freight on the railroads, and it will not put into the Treasury forty dollars a year out of the four hundred and sixty; it will not put into the Treasury a tenth part of this charge for postage. It is folly, then, to keep up the present rates and expect to make or save money. You shake the bush and the carriers of freight catch the bird.

I assert, then, that the Government must print some reports; that the only extra expense can be in printing an unnecessary number; and that an unnecessary number is not printed, in point of fact not enough of some documents—not enough for a reading, thinking, self-governing people.

Will you make the great departmental reports fewer than seven each for a district? Will you cut down the report on Mineral Resources below fourteen? Will you cut down the Land-Office Report below twenty? Shall the Commercial Relations be reduced below eleven; the Coast Survey below five; the Finance Report below seven; Commerce and Navigation below twenty-three? These affect the great vital questions of the nation, and furnish the basis for the action of all its branches. How can the numbers be reduced with safety?

The number of Globes is twenty-three. They contain what Congress does, and are for future times the only index of present national legislative action. The number is not excessive.

What shall I say of the seven hundred Agricultural Reports for each district? That is the only report printed in large numbers. That is a document of much value, recording the progress of the great overshadowing business of our people. It is their book, welcome everywhere, sought by all, and paying tenfold its cost year by year in valuable suggestions. Shall we cut down the Agricultural Report? My judgment is that we should not. All these books belong to the people, and they should have them free of charge. All do not read them; but in every community some one does, and the data, the facts, the ideas, the arguments, are caught up and pass from mind to mind. We must abandon all printing of documents if we save anything. I am not prepared for that.

We spend for light-houses $1,500,000 a year, and yet the light-houses of intelligence that are erected by printing are worth more, ten to one, than those that stand sentinel on the waters of the deep. We spend forty millions a year for our military establishment, and we expect to keep it up. So with our Navy, so with our public schools, our charities, our coast surveys, our river and harbor improvements, and our fortifications; they yield no profit in ready income.

Why expect the post-office to pay its way? Why any more than the Army or the Navy? Why any more than the harbors on which we lay out such large sums? The post-office does pay handsomely; but it does not (and while we have a great frontier and thin settlements it never will) cover all of its cost. And it never ought to. It is nonsense to try to make it do so.

If I could I would amend the bill and make a law that would furnish a supply of the documents of Congress to the libraries and institutions of learning and charity. I would provide the people with the Agricultural, Mineral, and Land-Office Reports. I would give the papers, daily and weekly, free circulation within their own counties, and charge a moderate rate of postage on all matter. I believe the day will come when the mail, like the school, will be free to all for letters and newspapers.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. I was for many years a disciple of many of the ideas of Horace Greeley, and among others I embraced this idea, which was one of his, of the repeal of the franking privilege. I was very urgent for it, and very glad when it was accomplished. I supposed that in its repeal we had got rid of a great abuse. And I came here to this session of Congress still maintaining those views, and I thought that nothing would ever persuade me in any degree to advocate the restoration of any part of it.

But in the committee-room, hearing the views of different gentlemen here, and having heard the views of different gentlemen with whom I have conversed, from various other parts of the country, I have been led to change my opinion. So far as this bill goes I am now its earnest advocate. It is not in accordance with all the convictions of my life, not in accordance with my own personal convictions, and not in accordance with the wishes of my constituents, but I believe it is for the interest of the country, and therefore I advocate it. I do not, as far as my own personal convictions are concerned, want this bill to pass; and I do not advocate it for my interest, or for the interests of my own particular constituents. But from what I have heard from the gentlemen in the committee-room, and the evidence we have had presented there, and the evidence we have had presented from various gentlemen all over the country, I am convinced it is a necessity; that the people want these books, and that the various illustrations which have been used on this floor against it are futile and fallacious; that they are not logical. I do not believe that the illustrations that have been introduced are fair at all. It has been the custom in this country to disseminate these documents; they have become sources of information to the people; the people demand them, and they ought to have them. Therefore I am willing, against all my previous convictions, and against the wishes of my own constituents, against the interest of many of them, to sustain this bill and advocate its passage.

I represent in my own city one of the largest printing communities in the country. We have there the Riverside Press, the Harvard University Press, and many other printing establishments. We believe that this system of publishing and distributing documents by Congress comes in conflict with the interests of those printing establishments. But I believe there is a demand for these documents for the benefit of the whole country, a demand to which I ought to yield. I have a generous, rich, and intelligent community, that believe in every means of education; and they will trust me in this matter, and will sustain me in yielding my own convictions and theirs to the support of this bill.

Now, just for the information of some members of this House, I want to say, as a side matter, that I went down to the city post-office but a little while ago, and found there a great many documents which you had sent there, documents that will never be forwarded to your constituents. There were speeches of members on this floor, agricultural documents, and other documents that had been put in the post-office without sufficient postage. They were piled up there and are sold every week as old paper, and your constituents will be disappointed by not receiving them. I say that it is more important to those constituents to receive those documents than it is for us to get rid of the burden of sending them. Since I have been here this session I have sent a great many documents to my constituents, have paid the postage on them most gladly, and will continue to do so without hesitation as long as this remains an unsettled question.

But I think our constituents do not require this at our hands. They want these documents; they call for them; they must have them; and therefore we ought to send them out to them. I disagreed, however, with the committee in framing this bill in some particulars. I think that the whole expense of sending out these documents ought not to be charged to the Post-Office Department, to increase its deficiency. My opinion was, and I advocated it in the committee, that the expenditures for sending out the Agricultural Reports, for instance, should be charged to the Agricultural Department, for the Patent Office reports to the Patent Office, and for speeches and documents of Congress to the contingent fund of the two Houses. But the committee were against that, and therefore I yielded to them, and will support the bill just as it is.

I hope no amendment hitherto moved to this bill will prevail. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] will fail. I do not want the total reinstatement of the franking privilege. I think it is bad policy for us to have a privilege which will inure more particularly to our benefit. Still I do not think it is for our benefit to have the franking privilege. I do not want any bill to pass for our benefit. I want a bill for the benefit of our constituents, not so much for mine, but for the constituencies of many others here for whom I have heard appeals on this floor. My constituents, as a general thing, do not require this bill to be passed. As I have already said, a great many of them do not wish it to pass. But from indications I have heard, I think there is a strong desire in the country for some such bill to pass. Therefore I advocate the passage of this bill, and hope it will pass just as the committee have reported it.

I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] for ten minutes.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the third section of this bill, and opposed to all its other provisions. I will briefly state the reasons for the view I have taken. The third section provides—

That from and after the passage of this act the following mail matter shall be allowed to pass free in the mail: First, newspapers, periodicals, and magazines reciprocally interchanged between publishers, and not exceeding sixteen ounces in weight to be confined to a single copy of each publication; secondly, weekly newspapers one copy to each actual subscriber residing or receiving the same within the county where the same is published; but carriers shall not be required to distribute such papers unless postage is paid upon them at the usual rates.

I am in favor of modifying this by striking out the word "weekly," and by inserting after the word "newspapers" the words "periodicals and magazines."

The object of this is to give a free circulation within the county where published for all periodicals, magazines, and newspapers, whether weekly, daily, monthly, or otherwise. The section as it now stands applies only to "weekly" newspapers, and excludes from free circulation daily and monthly papers, magazines, and periodicals.

As a general rule, special and exclusive privileges should not be granted to any profession or class of citizens. If the free circulation of newspapers in the county where published were a privilege for the benefit of publishers alone, I know of no principle on which it could be justified; but it is not. It is not for their benefit at all.

The Constitution very wisely provides that "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." This is based on the idea that it is the right of every citizen to speak and publish his sentiments subject to no restraint except a responsibility for the abuse of the privilege in a mode which results in wrong and damage to others. It is based on the idea also that a republican government cannot exist except by the general diffusion of knowledge.

Almost every State of the Union recognizes the wisdom, the absolute necessity, of this, by maintaining common schools, supported at the public expense, open to all the children thereof. Without this a republican government cannot endure. Where the people are the source of power they must be intelligent to secure a wise exercise of the power. The same principle which justifies common schools, supported at the public expense, also justifies the free circulation of newspapers and periodicals within appropriate limits.

I will not pronounce any eulogy on the press. Fortunately it needs none now. Common schools, the press, and public addresses of every kind are the great educational, moral, political, and religious instructors of the people.

The press now reaches almost all the people, and on grounds of public policy it deserves all reasonable encouragement. It is reasonable to give the encouragement now proposed. It is for the benefit of and open alike to all the people. It is not an exclusive privilege or benefit for any. It is a privilege which will be equally enjoyed by nearly all our citizens. It should be enjoyed by all. He who will not enjoy it cannot complain if others do.

It has been said that the city press is opposed to the measure now under consideration, while it is demanded by the so-called country press. There is no entire unanimity of either city or country press on this subject. The proposed measure will operate equally for all, or as nearly so as may be possible.

The large and widely circulated city press has the advantage of having newspapers carried in the mails broadcast all over the land, hundreds and thousands of miles, at no greater cost than is by existing law charged for carrying a country newspaper within the county where published. This gives to the city press a great advantage. If the law shall be changed so as to allow a free circulation within the county of publication, the whole press will alike enjoy its advantage. And this will give a free delivery from the post-office at the place of publication.

I will not draw any invidious distinction between the city and country press. The whole newspaper press, city and country, has a place, the value which cannot be estimated or dispensed with.

The press will very often represent the sentiment and interest of its immediate locality. But this is not always so. The New York Tribune for thirty years represented the protective-tariff sentiment of the whole country. It was in no sense local. So there are many city papers, wielding a powerful and salutary influence, broad and universal, regardless of locality, and aiming only at the public good. These ought not to be disparaged; no effort should be made to bring them into disrepute. But the so-called country press does as a general rule reflect the sentiments and interests of the people, and it deserves the confidence, attention, and care of the people and the Government.

In some localities the country press cannot be maintained without the aid of the measure now before us. We should not withhold from it the aid now proposed.

But the other provisions of the bill rest on a totally different principle, and to them I am opposed. Their object is in effect and to a limited extent to create a privilege equivalent in some respects to the recently abolished franking privilege.

The second section of the bill makes this provision:

That from and after the passage of this act all public documents, books, or publications, and all printed matter procured or published and issued by authority of Congress, or of either House thereof, and all packages of seeds, cuttings, roots, and scions, furnished by the Agricultural Department under authority of law, having first been stamped as is hereinafter provided and directed, shall be allowed to pass in the mails of the United States, to any citizen thereof, or person residing therein, without charge.

I know no reason why documents generally should be published at the expense of all the people and then distributed to a few.

The usage which has heretofore prevailed in publishing documents by authority of Congress has not provided them for one in twenty of the voters of the United States. Why should twenty voters be taxed for the favored one who receives the document? I know of no just principle on which this can be done. The practice adopted in England is one which we may well follow.

Let Congress order the publication of such documents essential to public information and the general interests of the country as cannot be published by private enterprise, and then let every citizen have the right to purchase them at cost. This will give all that the public interest requires. It will tax no man for the benefit of another. It will afford the means of information to all. It will give the press access to all desired information, and the press will give it to the whole people. This will give new importance to the press and a demand for wider newspaper circulation.

I know it will be said that the farmers demand the annual volume of the Agricultural Report. Let them have it. Successful agriculture requires this. Let it be published so that all may procure it.

But we must remember the agriculturists of this country demand and deserve something more substantial than a free volume annually of the Agricultural Report to one in twenty of their number. They want more and cheaper means of transporting their products to market. They want legislation which shall in future relieve them from the enormous exactions which may be imposed upon them by monopolies operating under patent rights, so far as legislation can operate on patents hereafter issued. Rights already acquired cannot be interfered with.

They want that the Agricultural Department of the Government shall ascertain in advance, as early as practicable each year, the probable amount of all products and the probable demand, and that this knowledge should be made accessible to them, so that they may know the value of their products and be able to demand and receive it without its being too largely absorbed by dealers between producers and consumers.

They want legislation which will favor the development of the agricultural and mineral resources of the country and multiply manufacturing enterprises, and make a home market, as far as practicable, without the cost of unnecessary transportation.

These are some, not all, of their wants, and they will not be satisfied with only free Agricultural Reports, nor with any benefit the franking privilege could give. Their demands are more extensive and of a different character. It becomes us to consider these, and do whatever justice and the public interest require.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICE] for ten minutes.

Mr. RICE. In saying the few words I propose to say in advocacy of this bill, I desire to put it upon the ground, and solely on the ground, that it is an educational measure. I believe it is a recognized principle in this country that education is one of the main props of a republic. That principle is acknowledged and acted upon by all the States in the establishment of free schools, where the people are educated without cost. And it has occurred to me that in the aggregation of States that are represented in this House, it may be proper for the United States as a whole to show its estimation of this valuable acquisition and privilege by doing what may be properly done by the Congress of the United States.

Now, I hold that every document that is issued from this Congress, authorized and published by provision of law of this Government, is of the greatest value to the people—if not to all the people, yet to a large majority of the people of this country. I take it that the papers that are published for the use of this House, every bill that is introduced here asking for something to be done for the benefit of the country or of a community, is information which should be sent to the people. The bill is read; it is advocated, and it is opposed; and the reasons why it should be passed, and the reasons why it should not be passed, are fully set forth by intelligent and competent gentlemen.

If it should be passed and approved, and should become a law, its effect is made known to the people by its operation; and those people throughout this country, who are as liable to be in this House as Representatives as we are, can thus gather a great fund of information that may be useful to them in the hour when they shall represent constituencies here. For that reason I believe those papers should all be published and spread among the people.

With regard to your Agricultural Reports, it is well known by gentlemen of this House that a very large number of those who are classed as cultivators of the soil in our country are not farmers. They have obtained the land for the asking. They have sought to establish their homes in those distant places. They cultivate rudely a portion of the ground; and they get but a slender return for their labor because of their lack of knowledge. Now, sir, the experience of the world is brought here into this city, is compiled by competent men, issued by authority of law, and sent broadcast over the land; and every man who reads may learn something that it will be highly useful for him to know; so that by this means the interest of the whole country, as well as of himself and family, is advanced.

Let me in this connection cite a statement contained in a letter which I saw a few days since in the hands of a gentleman from Georgia, who sits near me. The writer of the letter, describing some farming operations in his region of the country, said that "Jim"—I believe that was the only name he gave—who lived on a neighboring farm, had learned to read, that he had got possession of an Agricultural Report, and from the information contained in it had cultivated his small farm in such a manner that his crop that year was doubled. If that incident was true, (and I believe it to be true,) see what an advantage that Agricultural Report was to that one man. These reports, if sent free, go broadcast over the land. If postage is charged upon them they will not thus be circulated. A man living two hundred miles from the city which I have the honor to represent in part, when he puts his corn in a wagon and goes off from three to ten miles, and sells his load of thirty bushels for $4.50 at the railway station, is unwilling to take a portion of that $4.50 to pay fifty cents, seventy-five cents, or one dollar as postage on a book coming from this city. Money is too scarce and too precious with him to justify such an expenditure. He has to pay his taxes. He has to pay the interest on his indebtedness, if he has any, and it is very likely he has. There are a thousand and one little luxuries as you may call them, (though they have become necessaries,) which it requires money to buy; and he has but little money. You may say that if he does not choose to pay for those documents he can do without them. But, sir, I hold that that is not the principle on which this Government is conducted. We want to give the people all the information we can, so that we may advance their interests and at the same time the prosperity of the country. I maintain that the word "economy" does not properly come in here. "What is the cost?" has nothing to do with this question unless the cost is so enormous that the country cannot pay it. If the thing is right, you should do it whatever the cost; and if it is wrong, it should not be done though the cost is but a dollar.

There are seeds and plants gathered by the Government through the world, valued where they are known and grown, but unknown here. Those productions are brought here; and if they are sent out broadcast over our wide new country, where people are all now trying to acquire that knowledge which is necessary for their life, they can try the culture of those productions, and the results may in many cases be highly useful. But if postage is charged, these seeds and plants are shut out from the mails; they never reach those to whom they would be useful. Members may, for a time, pay the postage upon books, seeds, &c., as a gentleman said awhile ago he does cheerfully. But by and by that will be felt to be too troublesome and expensive. The sending of such things will gradually cease, until perhaps in two years from now not one copy of one of these books or one package of any of these seeds will ever reach the people who stand in need of them.

It is said that if these things are distributed, only one person in forty receives anything under such a system. Now, sir, my experience among the farmers (which is not very great) has been that when a farmer gets from this city a publication of the Government, containing any new thing which may be useful to him, he reads or tells it to his neighbors; they discuss it together; they join in trying experiments, so that there is not, perhaps, one farmer in that community who does not get the advantage of the information contained in that book. I believe there is no just ground for fearing that, because these books, &c., are not sent to every individual, their benefits will not be diffused among the people.

I hope this bill will pass. I do not believe it is liable to any of the objections which have been so strongly urged against the franking privilege. That privilege was objected to on the ground that it was abused by members to the injury of the Post-Office Department. How true that complaint was I do not know; but I believe the complaint never was intended to extend to the free circulation of seeds, books, &c., among the people for use on the farm, in the work-shop, and in general to promote the welfare of the country. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MELLISH.]

Mr. MELLISH. Mr. Speaker, if the visor of this bill is lifted I think there will be revealed the familiar but unattractive features of the franking privilege. The effect of laws passed in reference to this subject has been to give the franking privilege to the Departments of the Government, and take it away from Congress. This bill proposes to extend still further the franking privilege to the Departments. This is traveling backwards, and extending an abuse which should rather be restricted, indeed eviscerated, abolished altogether. Anything in this world that is worth having is worth paying for. This printing of books and distributing them free is a violation of the great principle of equal taxation, which should guide us in our action. There should be equal rights to all, special privileges to none. The mischievous principle underlying this bill is that it gives special privileges to a few, to be paid for by all. It is "dead-headism" embodied in a statute. In my opinion no special privileges should be given to farmers, to country editors, or anybody else. Is it not better to make postage universally cheap, so that the entire public shall participate in the benefit, rather than to favor the few and tax the many therefor.

The principle is entirely wrong, and for that reason yesterday I introduced an amendment, to provide that from and after the 1st day of July next all written matter of one ounce or fraction of an ounce in weight should be carried into any part of the United States for two cents, and all printed matter weighing two ounces or a fraction thereof should be carried for one-half cent. That would introduce uniform, simple rates of postage. Harper's Weekly and like papers would then pass through the mails for one cent, and country newspapers would be carried for twenty-six cents a year. It is cheap enough; and the country newspaper editor who has not ability to furnish a paper upon which subscribers are willing to pay twenty-six cents postage I think had better go into some other business. By claiming the special privilege of having his publication "dead-headed" through the mails he thereby advertises his imbecility and unfitness for his vocation. The people will, I think, be quite willing to pay that postage. It is an acknowledgment on the part of the country editor, when he demands this privilege, that he cannot publish a paper worth paying for.

I also introduced another feature, which I think will be quite convenient: that on the face of the postage-stamp there shall be plainly indicated the quantity and kind of mail matter it will carry. It will be no additional expense, and will be a great convenience.

My time is nearly expired, and I wish to say, in conclusion, that I am opposed to the franking privilege in toto, in any shape it may come here, but especially in giving these Departments the franking privilege. It was right that it should be taken from Congress, but it should also be taken from every executive office, otherwise the Departments do not show all their expenses. The thousands of Government clerks all over the country—I do not say have free access to postage-stamps, but I do say if there is danger of abuse of this franking privilege by Congressmen, how much greater is the danger of substituting thousands of clerks all over the country who may exercise this privilege.

[Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. PACKER. I now call the previous question on the bill, withdrawing the motion to recommit.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor herewith to submit the report of the centennial commissioners, and to add a word in the way of recommendation.

There have now been international expositions held by three of the great powers of Europe. It seems fitting that the one hundredth anniversary of our Independence should be marked by an event that will display to the world the growth and progress of a nation devoted to freedom, and to the pursuit of fame, fortune, and honors by the lowest citizen as well as the highest. A failure in this enterprise would be deplorable. Success can be assured by arousing public opinion to the importance of the occasion.

To secure this end, in my judgment, congressional legislation is necessary to make the exposition both national and international.

The benefits to be derived from a successful international exposition are manifold. It will necessarily be accompanied by expenses beyond the receipts from the exposition itself, but they will be compensated for many-fold by the commingling of people from all sections of our own country; by bringing together the people of different nationalities; by bringing into juxtaposition, for ready examination, our own and foreign skill and progress in manufactures, agriculture, art, science, and civilization.

The selection of the site for the exposition seems to me appropriate, from the fact that one hundred years before the date fixed for the exposition the Declaration of Independence, which launched us into the galaxy of nations as an independent people, emanated from the same spot.

We have much in our varied climate, soil, mineral products, and skill, of which advantage can be taken by other nationalities to their profit. In return they will bring to our shores works of their skill, and familiarize our people with them, to the mutual advantage of all parties.

Let us have a complete success in our centennial exposition, or suppress it in its infancy, acknowledging our inability to give it the international character to which our self-esteem aspires.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 25, 1874.

The message and accompanying documents were ordered to be printed, and referred to the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration and the Proposed National Census of 1875.

TRANSMISSION OF DOCUMENTS, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the transmission of public documents, &c., through the mails free of postage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PACKER,] in charge of the bill, has called for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will allow some amendments to be offered and voted upon.

Mr. SMALL. I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will at least allow a separate vote on the different sections of the bill.

Mr. PACKER. As instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, I do not feel at liberty to yield for any amendment except the one offered originally by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] which will bring the House to a fair and square vote on the question of repealing the law abolishing the franking privilege.

Mr. GARFIELD. A great many members desire a separate vote on the third section of this bill, and will vote against the whole bill if not allowed a separate vote on that section.

Mr. TYNER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for a motion to strike out so much of the bill as relates to the distribution of documents?

Mr. PACKER. I am not so instructed by my committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania states that on behalf of the committee he must decline to admit any other amendment than that offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That the act entitled "An act to abolish the franking privilege," approved January 31, 1873, and also the proviso to section 3 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1874," approved March 3, 1873, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and from and after the passage of this act all acts or parts of acts which were repealed, annulled, or made of no effect by the said acts and parts of acts hereby repealed, or either of them, be, and the same are hereby, revived and continued in full force.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws the motion to recommit, permits this amendment to be offered, and demands the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. KASSON. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania decided not to allow a vote to be had upon any proposition for the sale of documents in some manner to the public?

Mr. PACKER. A bill on that subject, as I have already stated, is pending before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and will be considered and reported upon by that committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. In view of the present state of the bill and the amendments, if the House should refuse to second the previous question, would not a motion be in order to strike out all of the bill except the third section?

The SPEAKER. Of course, if the House should refuse to second the demand for the previous question, the bill will be open for amendment.

Mr. PACKER. I understand that my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. SMALL] has an amendment which he desires to go upon the record.

Mr. SMALL. I desire, whenever I may have an opportunity, to move to amend, by adding the following as new sections:

SEC. —. From and after the 30th day of June, 1874, the charge for the delivery of letters by carriers shall be not exceeding one cent each, the whole of which shall be paid to them for their services.

SEC. —. Postage upon all mail matter, except such as may by law go free in the mails, shall be prepaid.

Mr. PACKER. The subject embraced in that amendment is now undergoing consideration by our committee.

Mr. TYNER. I would like to offer an amendment to that clause relating to newspaper postage, so as to require the prepayment of postage on all newspapers except those which may go free in the counties of their publication and also newspaper packages. Will the gentleman yield for an amendment of that kind?

Mr. PACKER. That matter is also undergoing examination by the committee, and there is great diversity of opinion on the subject. I must therefore decline to yield for the amendment.

The question being taken on seconding the call for the previous question, there were—ayes 94, noes 63.

Mr. GARFIELD called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TYNER and Mr. PACKER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 112, noes 67.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurring on ordering the main question,

Mr. TYNER and Mr. COTTON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 127, nays 118, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Arthur, Averill, Banning, Barber, Bass, Beck, Biery, Bowen, Bradley, Buckner, Burchard, Burleigh, Roderick R. Butler, Cannon, Cason, Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Comingo, Couger, Cook, Corwin, Crooke, Crutchfield, Danford, Alexander M. Ward, Wells, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Woodford, and Pierce M. B. Young—118.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Barry, Bell, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Dawes, Duell, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Robert S. Hale, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hersey, Hodges, Hooper, Leach, McLean, Mitchell, Morey, Nunn, Parsons, Pelham, Purman, Rusk, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, George L. Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Stephens, St. John, Storm, Swann, Sypher, Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, White, and Wood—45.

So the main question was ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was presented by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his Secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 483) to authorize the cancellation of an export bond for a portion of the distilled spirits of John S. Miller on board of bonded cars of the United States;

An act (H. R. No. 1041) for the relief of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana;

An act (H. R. No. 1769) for the relief of Colonel Daniel McClure, assistant paymaster-general;

An act (H. R. No. 1906) to dredge and protect the navigable channel at the mouth of Buffalo River against the sand-bar formed by the gale of December, 1873; and

An act (H. R. No. 1940) giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by James McDonnell, a warrant officer in the United States Navy, of a present from the King of Italy.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the House take a recess until half-past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. GARFIELD. This business then goes over until to-morrow?
The SPEAKER. Of course.
The House divided; and there were—ayes 75, noes 97.
So the House refused to take a recess.
Mr. PACKER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.
Mr. GARFIELD. On the latter motion I demand the yeas and nays.
Mr. WHITTHORNE. I move the House do now adjourn.
Mr. POLAND. Why not let us have our meeting to-night for the codification of the laws?
Mr. WHITTHORNE. It is too bad a night.
The House refused to adjourn.
Mr. POLAND. I now move we take a recess until half-past seven o'clock this evening.
The House divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 84.
Mr. O'BRIEN demanded tellers.
Tellers were not ordered.
Mr. RANDALL demanded the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were not ordered.
So the motion was agreed to.
And then (at a quarter before five o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening to resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873."
Mr. POLAND. I move on page 641, section 2545, line 7, to strike out after the word "entry" these words: "and Digges's Landing and Carrollsburgh ports of delivery."
The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. POLAND. I move on page 645, section 2558, line 16, to strike out after the word "entry" these words: "and Indian River and New Smyrna ports of delivery."
The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. POLAND. I move in the same section, in lines 30 and 31, to strike out the following words: "And Saint Andrew's Bay a port of delivery."
The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. POLAND. I move on page 655, section 2194, in line 18, to strike out "Southport" and insert "Kenosha."
Mr. Speaker, the name in the statute is Southport, but the name of that place has been changed to Kenosha. Therefore the committee felt warranted in inserting "Kenosha" in place of "Southport," the name of the place having been changed.
The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. POLAND. I move on page 661, section 2615, in line 5, to strike out "Comptroller of the Treasury," and insert "Commissioner of Customs;" so it will read:

SEC. 2615. The oath of office administered to any person appointed to any office under this title shall be certified under the hand and seal of the person by whom the same shall have been administered, and shall, within three months thereafter, be transmitted to the Commissioner of Customs. In default of taking such oath, or of transmitting a certificate thereof, the person failing shall be liable to a penalty of $200.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. POLAND. I move on page 679 to strike out section 2720; which is as follows:

SEC. 2720. The surveyors at Pacific City and at Milwaukee shall receive, in addition to the fees authorized by law, a salary not exceeding $1,000 a year each.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. POLAND. I move on page 679 to strike out section 2721; which is as follows:

SEC. 2721. The surveyors at Nisqually and Portland, in Oregon, shall receive, in addition to the fees authorized by law, a salary of $1,000 a year each.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. POLAND. I move on page 690, section 2796, to strike out the words "of the following;" and in the word "districts" to strike out the letter "s."
The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. POLAND. I move in the same section to strike out all after the word "district," in line 2, to and including "Albemarle," in line 9; as follows:

Portland and Falmouth, except the ports of North Yarmouth, Freeport, and Harpswell; Bath, except the ports of Georgetown and Brunswick; Newburyport; New London, except the port of Stonington; Middletown, except the ports of Lyme, Saybrook, Killingworth, Haddam, and East Haddam; Norfolk and Portsmouth; Petersburgh; Richmond; Yorktown; Tappahannock, except the port of Urbana or Albemarle.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. POLAND. I move in the same section to strike out all after the word "delivery," in the twelfth line, to and including the word "port" in the twentieth line. The words proposed to be stricken out are as follows:

And any vessel bound to a port of delivery in any district other than those above mentioned, or to either of the ports of delivery above mentioned, may first proceed to her port of delivery, and afterward make report and entry within the time by this title limited; and the master of every vessel arriving from a foreign port, or having merchandise on board, on which the duties have not been paid, and bound to any port on the Connecticut River, shall take an inspector on board at Saybrook, before proceeding to such port.

I will state, in reference to that, this arbitrary provision is to be found in an early statute upon the subject, but the general law requires every vessel from a foreign port shall make entry at some port of delivery.
The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2802, on page 692.
The section was as follows:

SEC. 2802. The collector receiving any bond conditioned for the payment of duties upon merchandise reported as destined for a foreign port, in case the same shall be landed within the United States, or any other bonds taken upon the exportation of merchandise entitled to drawback, shall, immediately after the time when, by the conditions of the same, they ought to be canceled, put the same in suit, provided the proof of the occurrence of such a necessity as excuses a landing of such goods within the United States has not been produced, or further time granted therefor by the Commissioner of Customs.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

In line 10 strike out "Commissioner of Customs," and insert "Secretary of the Treasury."

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2805, on page 693.
The section was as follows:

SEC. 2805. Within twenty-four hours after the arrival of such vessel within any other district, the master shall make report or entry to or with the collector of such other district, producing and showing the certified copy of his first report, together with a certificate from each collector of any other district within which any of the merchandise, brought in such vessel, has been landed, of the quantity and particulars of such merchandise as has been landed in each district respectively; except that in the State of Georgia such report may be made within forty-eight hours.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out all of the section after "respectively," in the eigth line, namely, these words: "except that in the State of Georgia such report may be made within forty-eight hours."

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

On page 694 strike out sections 2809, 2810, and 2811, which are as follows:
SEC. 2809. The master of any vessel arriving from any foreign port, having on board distilled spirits or wines, other than sea-stores, intended to be transported from one port in the United States to another, whether in the same or in different districts, shall, previous to the departure of such vessel from the port at which she first arrives, apply to the surveyor or officer acting as inspector of the revenue for the port for a certificate of the quantity and particulars of such spirits or wines as have been certified or reported to him to have been imported in such vessel, and of the quantity and particulars of such spirits or wines as appear to have been landed out of such vessel at such port. The surveyor or inspector of the revenue shall forthwith grant such certificate; and the master shall, within twenty-four hours after the arrival of such vessel at the port to which she is bound, deliver the certificate to the surveyor or person acting as inspector of the revenue of such port.
SEC. 2810. If any vessel shall proceed from one port to another within the United States with the whole or any part of such spirits or wines, without having first obtained such a certificate as is required by the preceding section, or if within twenty-four hours after her arrival at such other port the certificate shall not be delivered to the surveyor or inspector, as prescribed, the master shall, in either case, be liable to a penalty of $500, and the spirits or wines on board her shall be forfeited and may be seized.
SEC. 2811. Every surveyor, or officer acting as inspector of the revenue, for any port at which a vessel may arrive with such certificate, shall certify in the same manner all deliveries of spirits and wines made at their respective ports; and such certificate shall be annexed to the certificate granted at the port of original importation.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to offer a word of explanation in reference to those sections. They were provisions of our earliest laws in reference to revenue, when there were strict requirements as to obtaining certificates in relation to imported spirits and a variety of provisions, that have all been superseded by the whole tariff legislation of the country for the last forty years at least. These importations now stand like any other importations of merchandise, and the provisions of these sections have become entirely obsolete.
The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2826, on page 697.
The section was as follows:

SEC. 2826. In order to ascertain what articles ought to be exempted as the wearing apparel, and other personal baggage, and the tools or implements of a mechanical trade only, of persons who arrive in the United States, due entry thereof, as of other merchandise, but separate and distinct from that of any other merchandise, imported from a foreign port, shall be made with the collector of the district in which the articles are intended to be landed by the owner thereof, or his agent, expressing the persons by whom or for whom such entry is made, and particularizing the several packages, and their contents, with their marks and numbers; and the person who shall make the entry shall take and subscribe an oath before the collector, declaring that the entry subscribed by him and to which the oath is annexed contains, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a just and true account of the contents of the several packages mentioned in the entry, specifying the name of the vessel, of her master, and of the port from which she has arrived; and that such packages contain no merchandise whatever other than wearing apparel, personal baggage, or, as the case may be, tools of trade, specifying it; that they are all the property of a person named who is shortly expected, and are not directly or indirectly imported for any other, or intended for sale.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

In the twentieth line, after the word "who," insert "has arrived or;" and after the word "expected" insert the words "to arrive in the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2847, on page 702.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2847. When any merchandise is intended to be imported from any foreign country into the port of Selma, upon the Alabama River, in Alabama, such merchandise may be entered at any port of entry and thereafter transported to Selma, upon compliance with sections 2853 to 2859, inclusive.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

In lines 3 and 4, strike out "any port of entry," and insert in lieu thereof "Mobile."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2851, on page 703.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2851. When any merchandise is intended to be imported from any foreign country into either of the following ports of delivery, namely: Parkersburgh, in West Virginia; Paducah, in Kentucky; Saint Joseph and Kansas City, in Missouri; Memphis, in Tennessee; Alton, Galena, Quincy, Cairo, and Peoria, in Illinois; Evansville, New Albany, Madison, and Jeffersonville, in Indiana; Keokuk, Dubuque, and Burlington, in Iowa; Leavenworth, in Kansas; and Omaha, in Nebraska, such merchandise may be entered at the port of New Orleans, and thereafter transported to the port of delivery for which the same is intended, in compliance with sections 2853 to 2859, inclusive, and subject to the forfeitures and penalties therein mentioned.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

In line 5 strike out the words "and Peoria," and insert "and" before "Cairo."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2859, on page 705.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2859. The collector at the port of entry shall permit no entry to be made of merchandise, where the duty on the same shall exceed the amount of the bond deposited with the surveyor, nor shall the surveyor receive the bond of any person not entitled to a credit at the custom-house, nor for a sum less than fifty dollars. When the bond has been completed, and the actual amount of duty ascertained and certified on the margin, the surveyor of the port where the bond is taken shall deposit the same for collection in such bank as may be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out in the first line the words "the collector at the port of entry," and insert in lieu thereof the following, "when any merchandise is intended to be imported from any foreign country into either of the ports named in sections 2843 to 2852, inclusive, the collector of the port of entry named in such sections respectively."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment relates to section 2860, on page 705, and section 2572, on page 649. We struck out section 2572 and inserted a later provision which superseded it, which we found in the statute, but on going further in our examination we found that the revisers had also, over on page 705, included this latter act which superseded the one that was revised and made section 2572. And page 705 seems a more appropriate place. Therefore the committee determined to withdraw the substitute for section 2572 and strike out that section entirely. The amendment is precisely this section 2860, except that by a later act section 2572 applied only to Natchez; that is, foreign vessels coming to Natchez were required to make entry at New Orleans. That was superseded by a different provision of a later statute; and by still another statute Vicksburgh was included with Natchez, and they are both included in section 2860, which is as follows:

SEC. 2860. All vessels proceeding to the ports of Natchez or Vicksburgh from any foreign port shall stop and report their arrival at the port of New Orleans; and before any such vessel shall proceed on her voyage to Natchez or Vicksburgh the collector for the district of New Orleans shall order on board any such vessel a custom-house officer, who shall remain on board such vessel until her arrival at Natchez or Vicksburgh. Such custom-house officer shall take possession of and safely keep all the papers belonging to such vessel having relation to the freight or cargo on board, which papers he shall deliver to the collector at Natchez or Vicksburgh immediately after his arrival at that port; and any such vessel, which shall depart from New Orleans without such custom-house officer on board, shall be subject to all the pains and penalties provided for by law for a violation of the revenue laws.

So we leave section 2860 to stand; and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the substitute for section 2572.

There was no objection, and the substitute for section 2572 was withdrawn.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2550, on page 643, in connection with section 2863, on page 706, which is as follows:

SEC. 2863. Vessels bound up James River, in the State of Virginia, shall not be required to stop in Hampton Roads to deposit a manifest with the collector at Norfolk. But the master of the revenue-cutter stationed at Norfolk shall, under the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury, board all such vessels, and indorse their manifests, and place an officer on board of each vessel bound up James River, having a cargo from a foreign port. If, however, there is no revenue-cutter on that station for the purpose of boarding vessels, or when the state of the weather may be such as to render it impracticable to send an officer on board any vessel bound up James River, having a cargo from a foreign port, the captain shall deposit, with the surveyor at Hampton, a copy of the manifest of the cargo on board such vessel.

Section 2550 provided what should be done by foreign vessels that were going up James River. That was superseded by a later statute, and an entirely different provision was made, which we insert in lieu of section 2550. We find it is all contained in this section 2863; and therefore, if there be no objection, we withdraw section 2550 entirely.

There was no objection, and section 2550 was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to strike out sections 2865 and 2866.

The sections referred to were as follows:

SEC. 2865. All vessels bound to the city of La Fayette, in Louisiana, may, after proceeding thereto, and making report and entry at the port of New Orleans, within the time limited by law, be permitted to unlade their cargoes at La Fayette, under the regulations prescribed by law, and such further regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary.

SEC. 2866. All vessels about to depart from La Fayette for foreign ports shall be permitted, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, to clear with their cargoes at the custom-house in New Orleans, and depart as from the port of New Orleans; and merchandise imported into the United States, and exported from La Fayette, under such regulations, shall be entitled to the benefit of drawback of duties upon exportation to any foreign port under the same restrictions as if the merchandise had been exported directly from New Orleans.

Mr. POLAND. The port of La Fayette has been abolished as a separate port, and united with the port of New Orleans.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 2881.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 2881. For every verification of an invoice and certificate before a consul or commercial agent, such consul or commercial agent shall be entitled to demand and receive from the person making the same a fee of two dollars. But each shipper shall have the right to include all articles shipped by him in the same invoice.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is to insert after the words "two dollars" the words "and fifty cents."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 2890.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 2890. Except as allowed in the three preceding sections, no merchandise imported from any foreign place or country shall be admitted to an entry unless the invoice presented in all respects conforms to the requirements of those sections, and has thereon the certificate of the consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent in those sections specified, nor unless the invoice is verified at the time of making such entry by the oath of the owner or consignee, or of the authorized agent of the owner or consignee, certifying that the invoice and the declaration thereon are in all respects true, and were made by the person by whom the same purports to have been made, nor unless the triplicate transmitted by the consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent to the collector has been received by him.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend the first line by striking out "three" and inserting "four" before the words "preceding sections;" also, a little farther on in the section, strike out "those," before "sections," and insert after "sections" "2883, 2884, and 2885."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 2895.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 2895. Every person who makes out or passes, or attempts to pass, through the custom-house any false, forged, or fraudulent invoice, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by inserting, after the words "fraudulent invoice," the words "or who shall aid or abet in making or passing such false, forged, or fraudulent invoice;" also add to the section the words "or both, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is it intended to make a new class of crimes?

Mr. POLAND. No, sir. These words are in the statute; but the revisers left them out. The words we propose to insert are copied from the statute; the revisers omitted them, either by design or by mistake.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to strike out section 2940.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 2940. Where the appraised value of any merchandise appraised under any law concerning imports and tonnage shall exceed, by less than 25 per cent., the invoice value thereof, such appraised value shall be considered the true value of such merchandise, upon which the duty shall be charged, with the addition of such per centum as may be by law required.

Mr. POLAND. This section has been superseded by a later provision of the law in relation to appraisers and the effect of their appraisement.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 2961.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 2961. If the importer, owner, agent, or consignee, of any merchandise shall be dissatisfied with the appraisement, and shall have complied with the foregoing requisitions, he may forthwith give notice to the collector, in writing, of such dissatisfaction; on the receipt of which the collector shall select one discreet and experienced merchant to be associated with one of the general appraisers wherever practicable, or two discreet and experienced merchants, citizens of the United States, familiar with the character and value of the goods in question, to examine and appraise the same, agreeably to the foregoing provisions; and if they shall disagree, the collector shall decide between them; and the appraisement thus determined shall be deemed to be the true value, and the duties shall be levied thereon accordingly.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is near the close of the section to insert "final, and" before the words "deemed to be the true value."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 2962.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 2962. On the entry of any vessel, or of any merchandise, the decision of the collector of customs at the port of importation and entry, as to the rate and amount of duties to be paid on the tonnage of such vessel or on such merchandise, and the dutiable costs and charges thereon, shall be final and conclusive against all persons interested therein, unless the owner, master, commander, or consignee of such vessel, in the case of duties levied on tonnage, or the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of the merchandise, in the case of duties levied on merchandise, or the costs and charges thereon, shall, within ten days after the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs, as well in cases of merchandise entered in bond as for consumption, give notice in writing to the collector on each entry, if dissatisfied with his decision, setting forth therein, distinctly and specifically, the grounds of his objection thereto, and shall within thirty days after the date of such ascertainment and liquidation appeal therefrom to the Secretary of the Treasury. The decision of the Secretary on such appeal shall be conclusive; and such vessel, or merchandise, or costs and charges, shall be liable to duty accordingly, unless suit shall be brought within ninety days after the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury on such appeal for any duties which shall have been paid before the date of such decision on such vessel, or on such merchandise, or costs or charges, or within ninety days after the payment of duties paid after the decision of the Secretary. No suit shall be maintained in any court for the recovery of any duties alleged to have been erroneously or illegally exacted, until the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury shall have been first had on such appeal, unless the decision of the Secretary shall be delayed more than ninety days from the date of such appeal in case of an entry at any port east of the Rocky Mountains, or more than five months in case of an entry west of those mountains.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is near the middle of the section; to insert before the word "conclusive" the words "final and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 3020.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 3020. In case of entry for exportation there shall be no abatement of the duties or allowance made for any injury, damage, deterioration, loss, or leakage sustained by any merchandise while deposited in any public or private bonded warehouse.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out the first line of the section, "in case of entry for exportation there shall be no," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "in no case shall there be any."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. That is as far as the committee have gone in this chapter relating to customs. I have one or two amendments in the chapter on crimes, which I may as well offer now. The first amendment is in section 5395.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 5395. The punishment of whipping and standing in the pillory is abolished.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is to strike out the words "is abolished," and insert in lieu the words "shall not be inflicted."

Mr. ELDREDGE. Why is that?

Mr. POLAND. I do not suppose that the language which we propose to insert varies the meaning at all, but we think it better language than the other; and, more than that, it is the language of the statute.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Which is the language of the statute?

Mr. POLAND. "Shall not be inflicted."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 5433.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 5433. Every citizen who, on the high seas, willfully and corruptly casts away or otherwise destroys any vessel of which he is owner, in whole or part, with intent to prejudice any person that may underwrite any policy of insurance thereon, or any person that may have goods thereon, or any other owner of such vessel, shall suffer death.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is to strike out in the first line the word "citizen," and insert "person." The revisers substituted the word "citizen" for "person;" it may make quite an important difference, and we prefer the language of the statute.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 5514.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 5514. All property taken or detained by any officer or other person under authority of any revenue law of the United States shall be irrepleviable, and shall be deemed to be in the custody of the law and subject only to the orders and decrees of the courts of the United States having jurisdiction thereof. And every person who dispossesses or rescues, or attempts to dispossess or rescue, any property so taken or detained, or aids or assists therein, shall be imprisoned not more than twelve months, and fined not more than $300.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is to strike out the first sentence of the section, and the word "and" in the second sentence before the words "every person;" also to insert in the second sentence after the word "detained" the words "by any officer or other person under the authority of any revenue law of the United States;" also to strike out the word "so" before the words "taken or detained." The first part of this section is contained in another part of the revision.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 5526.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 5526. Every person who falsely makes, forges, or counterfeits, or causes or procures to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited, or willingly aids or assists in falsely making, forging, or counterfeiting, any coin in the resemblance or similitude of any of the minor coinage which has been or hereafter may be coined at the mints of the United States; or who passes, utters, publishes, or sells, or brings into the United States from any foreign place, or has in his possession, any such false, forged, or counterfeited coin, with intent to defraud any person whatsoever, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 and by imprisonment at hard labor not more than three years.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is to strike out the words "of the minor coinage," and insert in lieu thereof the words "copper coin or coin composed of copper and other base metals." We cannot find that phrase "minor coinage" in the statute, and we insert the language of the statute.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move further to amend by inserting after section 5552 the following, as a new section:

SEC. —. Every person who shall receive any money or other valuable thing under a threat of informing, or as a consideration for not informing, against any violation of any internal-revenue law, shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court, with costs of prosecution.

This section is found in the internal-revenue law; but we thought it more advisable to transfer it to the chapter of offenses. It is a literal copy of the statute.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.]

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The amendments which I have to offer are, with one exception, connected with some which will follow in the internal-revenue law, and they come first under the chapter beginning on page 73, entitled "The Commissioner of Internal Revenue." The first amendment is to section 323.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 323. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to designate one of the heads of division as chief clerk of the Bureau without additional confirmation.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to correct a misprint in this section by striking out at the end of the section the word "confirmation" and inserting "compensation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The next amendment is to section 324.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 324. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have general superintendence of the collection of all duties and taxes now or hereafter imposed by any law providing internal revenue; and shall prepare and distribute all the instructions, regulations, directions, forms, blanks, stamps, and other matters pertaining to the collection of internal revenue; and shall provide hydrometers, and proper and sufficient adhesive stamps and stamps or dies for expressing and denoting the several stamp duties, or, in the case of percentage duties, the amount thereof; and alter and renew or replace such stamps from time to time, as occasion may require.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to amend by inserting in line 3, before the word "collection" the words "assessment and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move further to amend by inserting before the word "collection," in the sixth line, the words "assessment and;" and by adding at the end of the section the following:

He may also contract for or procure the printing of requisite forms, decisions, and regulations; but the printing of such forms, decisions, and regulations shall be done at the Public Printing Office, unless the Public Printer shall be unable to perform the work: Provided, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, under such regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, after due public notice, receive bids and make contracts for supplying stationery, blank-books, and blanks to the collectors in the several collection districts; and the said Commissioner shall estimate in detail by collection districts the expense of assessing and the expense of the collection of internal revenue.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I wish in the next place to move an amendment to section 326.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 326. The Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be charged with such duties in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, or by law, and shall act as Commissioner of Internal Revenue in case of the absence or inability of that officer.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to amend by striking out in the last line of the section the words "or inability."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The only remaining amendment which I have to offer is to section 4356.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4356. Every vessel making voyages from a port in the United States to any foreign port, or, being of the burden of seventy-five tons or upward, from a port on the Atlantic to a port on the Pacific, or vice versa, shall have an official log-book; and every master of such vessel shall make, or cause to be made therein, entries of the following matters; that is to say:

First. Every legal conviction of any member of his crew, and the punishment inflicted.

Second. Every offense committed by any member of his crew for which it is intended to prosecute, or to enforce a forfeiture, together with such statement concerning the reading over such entry, and concerning the reply, if any, made to the charge, as is above required.

Third. Every offense for which punishment is inflicted on board, and the punishment inflicted.

Fourth. A statement of the conduct, character, and qualifications of each of his crew; or a statement that he declines to give an opinion of such particulars.

Fifth. Every case of illness or injury happening to any member of the crew, with the nature thereof, and the medical treatment.

Sixth. Every case of death happening on board, with the cause thereof.

Seventh. Every birth happening on board, with the sex of the infant, and the names of the parents.

Eighth. Every marriage taking place on board, with the names and ages of the parties.

Ninth. The name of every seaman or apprentice who ceases to be a member of the crew otherwise than by death, with the place, time, manner, and cause thereof.

Tenth. The wages due to any seaman or apprentice who dies during the voyage, and the gross amount of all deductions to be made therefrom.

Eleventh. The sale of the effects of any seaman or apprentice who dies during the voyage, including a statement of each article sold, and the sum received for it.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to amend by striking out before the word "required," at the end of the third paragraph, the word "above;" and by adding after the word "required" the words "by the provisions of section 4664."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. This amendment completes the part of the revision which has been under my particular charge; and I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. PENDLETON.]

Mr. BURCHARD. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] takes his seat, I would like to ask him whether there are not at present two deputy commissioners of internal revenue. There were, I believe, three before we passed a few days ago a bill abolishing one of those offices. I see that this revision provides for only one deputy commissioner; and hence I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the matter.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I can only answer that I have not found any statute providing for more than one. This revision has been submitted to the Treasury Department, where it has received very careful consideration without the suggestion of any addition in this respect.

Mr. BURCHARD. The compilation of the internal-revenue laws for 1873, referring to the act of June 22, 1870, gives the provision for two deputy commissioners, each with a salary of $3,000. By a bill which has recently become a law we abolished one of those offices. I do not suggest any amendment. I only call attention to the matter.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The Treasury Department has had under careful consideration that part of the revision relating to the organization of that Department; and though many amendments, both before and after this particular provision, have been suggested from that Department, there has been none in this respect; and the committee found no provision of law for more than one deputy. I am very sure if in the Treasury Department there had been any idea that there was a law for more than one it would have been suggested.

Mr. BURCHARD. Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe the law gives the powers of the Commissioner to the first deputy only; and as the law now stands there is no reason why there should be more than one deputy. But my recollection is that there have been three—a first, a second, and a third deputy, and that there are now a first and second deputy actually occupying those offices.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move on page 789, title 35, "Internal Revenue," chapter 1, in section 3203, line 4, to insert after the words "any State" the words "or Territory, or the District of Columbia;" and in line 6 to add the letter "s" to the word "district;" so it will read:

SEC. 3203. For the purpose of assessing, levying, and collecting the taxes provided by the internal-revenue laws, the President may establish convenient collection districts, and for that purpose he may subdivide any State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, or may unite two or more States or Territories into one district, and may from time to time alter said districts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in line 8, same section, to strike out from and after the word "State" these words:

Is entitled: And provided further, That in the State of California the President may establish a number of districts not exceeding the number of Senators and Representatives to which said State is entitled.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Was entitled in the Thirty-seventh Congress, except in such States as were entitled to increased representation in the Thirty-eighth Congress, in which States the number of districts shall not exceed the number of Representatives to which any State was so entitled: And provided further, In the State of California the President may establish a number of districts not exceeding the number of Senators and Representatives to which said State was entitled in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

So it will read:

SEC. 3203. For the purpose of assessing, levying, and collecting the taxes provided by the internal-revenue laws, the President may establish convenient collection districts; and for that purpose he may subdivide any State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, or may unite two or more States or Territories into one district, and may from time to time alter said districts: Provided, That the number of districts in any State shall not exceed the number of Representatives in Congress to which such State was entitled in the Thirty-seventh Congress, except in such States as were entitled to increased representation in the Thirty-eighth Congress, in which States the number of districts shall not exceed the number of Representatives to which any State was so entitled: And provided further, In the State of California, the President may establish a number of districts not exceeding the number of Senators and Representatives to which said State was entitled in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

Mr. MAYNARD. Do I understand there are five collection districts in the State of California?

Mr. PENDLETON. The number cannot exceed the number of Senators and Representatives.

Mr. MAYNARD. Has there been no change since this act was passed, I believe in the Thirty-seventh Congress, when they had three Representatives, and, of course, two Senators?

Mr. PENDLETON. The act was passed June 30, 1864.

Mr. MAYNARD. Cannot the committee find any legislation restricting the number of collection districts?

Mr. PENDLETON. This is in accordance with the opinion of the Attorney-General.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move on page 790, section 3204, in line 6, after the word "make," to insert the letter "a," and substitute for the word "appointments" the word "appointment," and for the word "officers" the word "officer;" so it will read:

SEC. 3204. The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint for each collection district a collector, who shall be a resident of the same. When two or more collection districts are united by him, he may designate from among the existing officers of such districts one collector for the new district, or, at his discretion, he may make a new appointment of such officer for said district.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to strike out section 3205, on page 791; which is as follows:

SEC. 3205. The Secretary of the Treasury may fix such additional rates of compensation to be made to inspectors in Louisiana, Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama, Florida, Texas, Arkansas, North Carolina, Mississippi, Tennessee, California, Nevada, and Oregon, and the Territories, as may appear to him to be just and equitable, in consequence of the greater cost of living and traveling in those States and Territories, and as may, in his judgment, be necessary to secure the services of competent officers; but the compensation thus allowed shall not exceed the rate of $5,000 per annum.

It applies simply to inspectors of tobacco who are compensated by fees.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move on page 790, section 3207, in line 8, to strike out the words "and approved;" and in line 9, after the word "Treasury," to insert the words "and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury;" so it will read:

SEC. 3207. It shall be the duty of such collectors of internal revenue as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to act as disbursing agents of the Treasury for the payment of all expenses of collection of taxes and other expenditures for the internal-revenue service within their respective districts, under regulations and instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury, on giving good and sufficient bond, with such sureties, in such form, and in such penal sum as shall be prescribed by the First Comptroller of the Treasury, and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the faithful performance of their duties as such disbursing agents; but no additional compensation shall be paid to collectors for such services.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move on page 791, section 3208, to insert after the word "tax" in line 14, the word "received," and to insert after the word "tax" in line 16 the word "received," and in line 35 insert after the word "happen" the words "by death or resignation;" so it will read:

SEC. 3208. There shall be allowed to collectors, in full compensation for their services, and for those of their deputies, a salary of $1,500 per annum, to be paid quarterly, and in addition thereto a commission of 3 per cent. upon the first $100,000, of 1 per cent. upon all sums above $100,000 and not exceeding $400,000, and of one-half of 1 per cent. upon all sums above $400,000 and not exceeding $1,000,000, and of one-eighth of 1 per cent. on all sums above $1,000,000; such commissions to be computed upon the amount by them respectively collected and paid over and accounted for under the instructions of the Treasury Department; except that in determining the compensation to be allowed to any collector the commission shall be computed on only one-half of the tax received on any articles which shall have been transported from his district in bond, and on only one-half of the tax received on any articles received in his district in bond, where such transportation has been by shipment from one district to another. And there shall be further paid, after the account thereof has been rendered to and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury, to each collector his necessary and reasonable charges for advertising, stationery, and blank-books used in the performance of his official duties, and for postage actually paid on letters and documents received or sent, and exclusively relating to official business; but no such account shall be allowed unless it states the date and the particular items of every such expenditure, and is verified by the oath of the collector. The Secretary of the Treasury may make such further allowances, from time to time, as may be reasonable, in cases where, by reason of the territorial extent of the district, or the amount of internal taxes collected, or other circumstances, it may seem just to make such allowances. But the total net compensation of a collector shall not in any case exceed $4,500 a year; and no collector shall be entitled to any portion of the salary pertaining to his office unless he shall have been confirmed by the Senate, except in cases of commissions to fill vacancies which happen by death or resignation during the recess of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move on the same page, section 3209, in line 1, after the word "collectors," to insert the words "accruing after June 30, 1864;" so it will read:

SEC. 3209. In adjusting the accounts of collectors accruing after June 30, 1864, and in the payment of their compensation for services, the fiscal year of the Treasury shall be observed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move on the same page, section 3210, in line 1, to strike out the word "compensation" and insert the word "commissions;" so it will read:

SEC. 3210. When any part of the commissions of the collector of any district is by commission upon assessments or collections, and, in consequence of a new appointment, is due to more than one collector within the same year, such commissions shall be apportioned between such collectors; but in no case shall a greater amount of compensation be allowed to two or more collectors in the same district than shall have been authorized by law to be allowed to one collector. But no payment shall be made to collectors, on account of salaries or commissions, without the certificate of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that all reports required by law or regulation have been received, or that a satisfactory explanation has been rendered to him of the cause of delay.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move on page 793, at the end of section 3214, which is as follows:

SEC. 3214. There shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in every collection district where they may be necessary, one or more inspectors of tobacco and cigars, who shall take an oath faithfully to perform their duties, in such form as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe, and shall be entitled to receive such fees as he may prescribe, to be paid by the owner or manufacturer of the articles inspected—

To add the following words:

Such inspectors shall be required to give bonds, with security, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury or collector of the district, in a sum not less than $5,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of such inspector.

That is provided for by the act of 1867.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move on the same page, section 3215, in line 8, to strike out the word "hereafter;" in line 10, after the word "known," to insert "of the Treasury Department in connection with the internal revenue;" and in lines 12 and 13 to strike out after the word "office" "in connection with the internal revenue;" so it will read:

SEC. 3215. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, whenever in his judgment the necessities of the service so require, employ competent agents, not exceeding at any time twenty-five in number, to be paid such compensation as he may deem proper, not exceeding, in aggregate, any appropriation made for that purpose, and he may, at his discretion, assign any such agent to duty under the direction of any officer of internal revenue, or to such other special duty as he may deem necessary; and no general or special agent or inspector, by whatever designation he may be known, of the Treasury Department, in connection with the internal revenue, except inspectors of tobacco, snuff, and cigars, and except as provided for in this title, shall be appointed, commissioned, employed, or continued in office.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3221, on page 794.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3221. Every internal-revenue officer, whose payment, charges, salary, or compensation are composed, wholly or in part, of fees, commissions, allowances, or rewards, from whatever source derived, shall be required to render to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under regulations to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, a statement under oath setting forth the entire amount of such fees, commissions, emoluments, or rewards of whatever nature, or from whatever source received, during the time for which said statement is rendered; and any false statement knowingly and willfully rendered under the requirements of this section, or regulations established in accordance therewith, shall be deemed willful perjury, and punished in the manner provided by law for the crime of perjury committed in proceedings in the courts of the United States. And any neglect or omission to render such statement when required shall be punished by a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $500, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

In lines 13 and 14 strike out the words "committed in proceedings in the courts of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3222, on page 794.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3222. The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint not exceeding ten officers, to be called supervisors of internal revenue, each of whom may be assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to duty in any part of the United States, and may be transferred from place to place, according to the exigency of the public service.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

In line 3 strike out the word "may," and substitute therefor the word "shall."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3224, on page 795.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3224. In any port of the United States where there is more than one collector of internal revenue the Secretary of the Treasury may designate one of them to have charge of all matters relating to the exportation of articles subject to tax under the internal-revenue laws; and at any port where he may deem it necessary there shall be appointed by him an officer to superintend all matters of exportation and drawback, under the direction of the collector. The compensation of the officers last named shall be prescribed by him, but shall not exceed, in any case, an annual rate of $2,000, excepting at New York, where such compensation shall be at the annual rate of $3,000. At any port where there is no superintendent of exports, all the duties and services required of such officers shall be performed by the collector of internal revenue designated to have charge of exportation. All the books, papers, and documents in the bureau of drawbacks in the respective ports, relating to the drawback of taxes paid under the internal-revenue laws, shall be delivered to the collector of internal revenue in charge of exportation.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

In line 9 strike out the word "him" and substitute therefor the words "the Secretary of the Treasury."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3225, on page 795.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3225. Every collector of internal revenue in charge of exportation and every superintendent of exports and drawbacks is authorized to administer such oaths and to certify to such papers as may be necessary under any regulation prescribed under the authority of the internal-revenue laws.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment.

In lines 1 and 2 strike out the words "in charge of exportation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3226, on page 795.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3226. Every supervisor, under the direction of the Commissioner, shall see that all laws and regulations relating to the collection of internal taxes are faithfully executed and complied with; and shall aid in the prevention, detection, and punishment of any frauds in relation thereto, and examine into the efficiency and conduct of all officers of internal revenue; and for such purposes he shall have power to examine all persons, books, papers, accounts, and premises, to administer oaths, and to summon any person to produce books and papers, or to appear and testify under oath before him, and to compel a compliance with such summons in the same manner as collectors may do. He shall report in writing to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue any neglect of duty, incompetency, delinquency, or malfeasance in office of any internal-revenue officer of which he may obtain knowledge, with a statement of all the facts in each case, and any evidence sustaining the same. He may, by notice in writing, suspend from duty any inspector, gauger, or store-keeper, and he may by like notice suspend any collector for fraud, or gross neglect of duty, or abuse of power. In case of the suspension of any inspector, gauger, or store-keeper, he shall immediately notify the collector of the proper district and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and within three days thereafter report his action and his reasons therefor, in writing, to the Commissioner. In case of the suspension of any collector, he shall immediately report his action to the Commissioner, with his reasons therefor, in writing, and the Commissioner, in all cases of suspension, shall thereupon take such action as he may deem proper. Every supervisor may also transfer any inspector, gauger, or store-keeper from one distillery, or other place of duty, or from one collection district, to another, and shall, in like manner, report his action and his reasons therefor to the Commissioner.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

In line 17 strike out the words "by like notice." In lines 29 and 30 strike out all after the word "another" to the end of the paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3231, on page 797.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3231. Any internal-revenue officer who is or shall become interested, directly or indirectly, in the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, or in the production, rectification, or redistillation of distilled spirits, or in the production of fermented liquors, shall be dismissed from office; and every officer who becomes so interested in any such manufacture or production, rectification, or redistillation, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

In line 4 strike out the words "or in the production of fermented liquors," and insert the same in line 7, after the word "distillation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to offer a new section, to come in after section 3233, at the end of the chapter. I send the amendment to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following as a new section after section 3233:

SEC. —. If any officer appointed under and by virtue of any act to provide internal revenue, or any person acting under or by authority of any such officer, shall receive any injury to his person or property, for or on account of any act by him done under any law of the United States for the collection of taxes, he shall be entitled to maintain suit for damages therefor in the circuit court of the United States, in the district where the party doing the injury may reside or shall be found.

Mr. PENDLETON. That is a copy of a provision in the existing statute.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a new section, which I move to insert as a substitute for section 3235.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 3235, and insert the following as section 3235:

It shall be the duty of any person, partnership, firm, association, or corporation, made liable to any duty, special tax, stamp, or tax imposed by law, when not otherwise provided for, on or before the first Monday of March in each year, and in other cases before the first day of levy, to make a list or return verified by oath or affirmation to the deputy collector of the district where located of the articles or objects charged with a special duty or tax, the quantity of goods, wares, and merchandise made or sold, and charged with a specific or ad valorem duty or tax, the several rates and aggregate amounts according to the forms and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for which such person, partnership, firm, association, or corporation is liable: Provided, That if any person liable to pay any duty or tax, or owning, possessing, or having the care or management of property, goods, wares, and merchandise, articles or objects liable to pay any duty, tax, or license, shall fail to make and exhibit a list, or return, as required by law, but shall consent to disclose the particulars of any and all the property, goods, wares, and merchandise, articles and objects liable to pay any duty or tax, or any business occupation liable to pay any special tax as aforesaid, then and in that case it shall be the duty of the deputy collector to make such list or return, which being distinctly read, consented to, and signed and verified by oath or affirmation by the person so owning, possessing, or having the care and management as aforesaid, may be received as the list of such person: Provided further, That in case any person shall be absent from his or her residence or place of business at the time a deputy collector shall call for the annual list or return, and no annual list or return has been rendered by such person to the deputy collector, as required by law, it shall be the duty of such deputy collector to leave at such place of residence or business, with some one of suitable age and discretion, if such be present; otherwise to deposit in the nearest post-office, a note or memorandum, addressed to such person, requiring him or her to render to such deputy collector the list or return required by law within ten days of the date of such note or memorandum, verified by oath or affirmation. And if any person, on being notified or required as aforesaid shall refuse or neglect to render such list or return within the time required as aforesaid, or whenever any person who is required to deliver monthly, or otherwise return all objects subject to a tax fails to do so at the time required, or delivers any return which, in the opinion of the collector, is false or fraudulent, or contains any undervaluation or understatement, it shall be lawful for the collector to summon such person, or any other person having possession, custody, or care of books or accounts containing entries relating to the business of such person, or any other person he may deem proper, to appear before him and produce such books at a time and place named in the summons, and to give testimony or answer interrogatories under oath respecting any objects liable to tax or the returns thereof. The collector may summon any person residing or found within the State in which his district lies, and when the person intended to be summoned does not reside and cannot be found within such State, he may enter any collection district where such person may be found, and there make the examination herein authorized. And to this end he may there exercise all the authority which he might lawfully exercise in the district for which he was commissioned.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is in section 3237.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 3237. Whenever any person summoned under the two preceding sections neglects or refuses to obey such summons, or to give testimony, or to answer interrogatories as required, the collector shall apply to the judge of the district court or to a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States for the district within which the person so summoned resides, or may be found, for attachment against him as for contempt. It shall be the duty of the judge or commissioner to hear the application, and, if satisfactory proof is made, to issue an attachment, directed to some proper officer, for the arrest of such person, and upon his being brought before him to proceed to a hearing of the case; and upon such hearing the judge or commissioner shall have power to make such order as he shall deem proper, not inconsistent with existing laws for the punishment of contempts, to enforce obedience to the requirements of the summons, and to punish such person for his default or disobedience.

Mr. PENDLETON. The amendment is in the first part of the section, to strike out the word "shall," and insert the word "may" after "collector," and strike out the words "may be found," before the words "for an attachment," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is in section 3238.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 3238. The collector or any deputy collector in every district shall enter into and upon the premises, if it be necessary, of every person therein who has taxable property and who refuses or neglects to render any return or list required by law, or who renders a false or fraudulent return or list, and make, according to the best information which he can obtain, including that derived from the evidence elicited by the examination of the collector, and on his own view and information, such list or return, according to the form prescribed, of the objects liable to tax, owned or possessed, or under the care or management of such person, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall assess the tax thereon, and in case of any return of a false or fraudulent list or valuation, he shall add 100 per cent. to such tax; and in case of a refusal or neglect, except in cases of sickness or absence, to make a list or return, or to verify the same as aforesaid, he shall add 50 per cent. to such tax. In case of neglect occasioned by sickness or absence as aforesaid, the collector may allow such further time for making and delivering such list or return as he may deem necessary, not exceeding thirty days. The amount so added to the tax shall, in all cases, be collected at the same time and in the same manner as the tax; and the list or return so made and subscribed by such collector or deputy collector shall be held good and sufficient for all legal purposes.

Mr. PENDLETON. The amendment is, after the words "Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall asses, the tax thereon," to insert the words "including the amount, if any, due for special taxes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is in section 3239.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 3239. Any revenue officer may enter, in the day-time, any building or place where any articles or objects subject to tax under schedule A are made, produced, or kept, within his district, so far as it may be necessary, for the purpose of examining said articles or objects. And any owner of such building or place, or person having the agency or superintendence of the same, who refuses to admit such officer, or to suffer him to examine such article or articles, shall, for every such refusal, forfeit $500. And when such premises are open at night, such officers may enter them while so open, in the performance of their official duties.

Mr. PENDLETON. The amendment is, in the first line, to strike out the words "revenue officer," and insert in lieu the words "collector, deputy collector, or inspector;" also in the first part of the section strike out the words "under schedule A."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move further to amend the same section by adding thereto the following:

And if any person shall forcibly obstruct or hinder any collector, deputy collector, or inspector in the execution of any power and authority vested in him by law, or shall forcibly rescue, or cause to be rescued, any property, articles, or objects, after the same shall have been seized by him, or shall attempt or endeavor so to do, the person so offending, except in cases otherwise provided for, shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay the sum of $500, or double the value of the property so rescued, or be imprisoned for a term not exceeding two years, at the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Attention was called by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] to what he thought was an omission in the organization of the Treasury Department, in that only one deputy commissioner of internal revenue was mentioned. I find that under the statute of 1866 there is mentioned a deputy commissioner by himself; and afterward, among the subordinate officers, two deputy commissioners are named in that statute. Those two deputy commissioners, with exactly the designation of the statute, will be found on page 53, in these words:

In the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be employed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, two deputy commissioners, at a salary of $3,000 a year each.

A deputy commissioner was first provided for as the principal officer, who is to take the place of the Commissioner in his absence. He is put into the chapter providing for the organization of the Department.

Mr. BURCHARD. I was not aware that there was another place where the subordinate officers in the Treasury Department are specifically mentioned. I find it is as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] has stated.

Mr. POLAND. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BARBER,] who has some amendments to offer.

Mr. BARBER. The amendments which I shall offer relate to bounty lands. The first will be to section 2426.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 2426. Each of the surviving, or the widow or minor children of deceased commissioned and non-commissioned officers, musicians, or privates, whether of regulars, volunteers, rangers, or militia, who performed military service in any regiment, company, or detachment, in the service of the United States in the war with Great Britain, declared on the 18th day of June, 1812, or in any of the Indian wars since 1790, and each of the commissioned officers who was engaged in the military service of the United States in the war with Mexico, shall be entitled to lands as follows: Those who engaged to serve twelve months or during the war and actually served nine months, shall receive one hundred and sixty acres, and those who engaged to serve six months and actually served four months, shall receive eighty acres, and those who engaged to serve for any or an indefinite period and actually served one month, shall receive forty acres; but wherever any officer or soldier was honorably discharged in consequence of disability contracted in the service, before the expiration of his period of service, he shall receive the amount to which he would have been entitled if he had served the full period for which he had engaged to serve.

Mr. BARBER. Under the law in relation to the Mexican war an offer of bounty in land or in money was made while the war was going on. It was a promise by the Government, and the soldiers performed their services under that contract. The first amendment is to insert after the words "any of the Indian wars since 1790" the words "and prior to 3d March, 1850." That is the date of the passage of the act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. The next amendment is to add to the section that which I send to the Clerk's desk, embracing the peculiarities of the act of 1847, promising bounty land to soldiers who might serve or were then in service, or who might thereafter enlist and serve in the Mexican war. That differs from the other bounty law, which is copied in the section as here printed.

The addition to the section was as follows:

All the persons enumerated in this section who enlisted in the regular Army, or were mustered in any volunteer company for a period of not less than twelve months, and who served in the war with Mexico and received an honorable discharge, or who were killed, or died of wounds received or sickness incurred in the course of such service, or were discharged before the expiration of the term of service in consequence of wounds received or sickness incurred in the course of such service, shall be entitled to receive a certificate or warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land; or, at option, Treasury scrip for $100, bearing interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually at the pleasure of the Government. In the event of the death of any one of the persons mentioned in this section during service, or after his discharge, and before the issuing of a certificate or warrant, the warrant or scrip shall be issued in favor of his family or relatives; first, to the widow and his children; secondly, his father; thirdly, his mother; fourthly, his brothers and sisters.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move to insert after the section just amended, as a new section, that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The proposed new section was as follows:

SEC. —. The persons enumerated in the preceding section, received into service after the commencement of the war with Mexico, for less than twelve months, and who served such term, or were honorably discharged, are entitled to receive a certificate or warrant for forty acres, or scrip for twenty-five dollars, if preferred, and in the event of the death of such person during service, or after honorable discharge, before the 11th of February, 1847, the warrant or scrip shall issue to the wife, child, or children, if there be any, and if none, to the father, and if no father, to the mother of such soldier.

The additional section was adopted.

Mr. BARBER. I wish to propose an amendment to section 2427.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2427. Where the militia, or volunteers, or State troops of any State or Territory were called into service, whose services have been paid by the United States subsequent to the 18th day of June, 1812, the officers and soldiers thereof shall be entitled to all the benefits of the preceding section, upon proof of length of service as therein required.

Mr. BARBER. I move to amend by inserting after "1812" the words "and prior to March 22, 1852."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. It occurs to me that the amendment as it now is refers simply to the time of payment of troops paid prior to March 22, 1852; and I suppose it really should refer to the time when service was rendered, instead of the time of payment.

Mr. BARBER. It is intended to refer to service.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. The amendment in its present form refers to the time of payment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The object will be accomplished by inserting after the words "State or Territory" the words "whose services have been paid by the United States."

Mr. BARBER. That would be the proper place for the insertion.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. The services might have been rendered long before; but payment has been made subsequent to June 18, 1812.

Mr. POLAND. If the words "whose services have been paid by the United States" are inserted after "Territory," and the same words be struck out in the other place, it will make the section correspond with the law as it is. The law does not apply to service performed prior to 1812. I move to modify the amendment in that way.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move further to amend the same section by striking out "the preceding," before "section," and inserting "2426" after "section."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move to amend section 2428, so that it will read as follows:

SEC. 2428. No person shall take any benefit under the provisions of section 2424 if he has received, or is entitled to receive, any military land bounty under any act of Congress passed prior to the 22d day of March, 1852.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move to amend by striking out in lines 6 and 7, of section 2431, the words "but such benefit shall not inure to her heirs;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 2431. In the event of the death of any person for whom provision is made by sections 2426 and 2427, and who did not receive bounty land for his services, a like warrant shall issue in favor of his widow, who shall be entitled to one hundred and sixty acres of land in case her husband was killed in battle; nor shall a subsequent marriage impair the right of any widow to such warrant, if she be a widow at the time of making her application.

The words which I propose to strike out were the verbiage of one act; but subsequently it was provided that the benefits of the law should vest in the widow, and should go to her heirs in case of her death.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I have an amendment to section 2434.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2434. The following classes of persons are included as beneficiaries under section 2432, without regard to the length of service rendered, provided they were regularly mustered into the service of the United States, namely:

First. Officers and soldiers who have been actually engaged in any battle in any of the wars in which this country has been engaged since 1790 and prior to March 3, 1855.

Second. Those volunteers who served at the invasion of Plattsburgh, in September, 1814.

Third. The volunteeers who served at the battle of King's Mountain, in the revolutionary war.

Fourth. The volunteers who served at the battle of Nickojack, against the confederate savages of the South.

Fifth. The volunteers who served at the attack on Lewiston, in Delaware, by the British fleet, in the war of 1812.

Mr. BARBER. I move to amend by striking out in the first paragraph of the section the words "provided they were regularly mustered into the service of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move further to amend the same section by striking out in the first line of the second paragraph the words "officers and soldiers," and inserting in lieu thereof "any of the classes of persons mentioned in section 2433." The reason for this amendment is that a subsequent statute provided that persons who were in the service of the United States, whether mustered or not, and paid by the United States, should be entitled to the benefits of the bounty-land law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. The next amendment I propose to offer is to section 2438.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2438. Where no record evidence of the service for which a warrant is claimed under section 2432 exists, parol evidence may be admitted to prove the service performed, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe.

Mr. BARBER. I move to amend by striking out the words "under section 2432."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move to amend section 2441 by striking out the words "passed by Congress prior to the 3d of March, 1855;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 2441. The provisions of all the bounty-land laws shall be extended to Indians in the same manner and to the same extent as to white persons.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move to amend section 2439 by adding after the word "warrant" in the first line the words "or certificate;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 2439. Where a warrant or certificate for bounty land for any less quantity than one hundred and sixty acres has been issued to any officer or soldier, or to the widow or minor child of any officer or soldier, the evidence upon which such warrant was issued shall be received to establish the service of such officer or soldier in the application of himself, or of his widow or minor child, for a warrant for so much land as may be required to make up the full sum of one hundred and sixty acres, to which he may be entitled under section 2432, on proof of the identity of such officer or soldier, or, in case of his death, of the marriage and identity of his widow, or, in case of her death, of the identity of his minor child. But if, upon a review of such evidence, the Commissioner of Pensions is not satisfied that the former warrant was properly granted, he may require additional evidence, as well of the term as of the fact of service.

Under the law giving bounty land for services in the Mexican war, the words are "warrant or certificate;" and the propriety of the use of those two words was that the soldier had the option under the certificate to go to the Treasury and have scrip for $100 issued to him in lieu of a land warrant.

Mr. POLAND. The gentleman does not understand his amendment as I understand it. The words "certificate or" are to be inserted, I think, before the word "warrant" in the sixth line, and before the same word in the thirteenth line, but not in the first line.

Mr. BARBER. I understand that the word "certificate" applies to both.

Mr. POLAND. No, sir; the object of the statute is this: that where a man has received a less quantity of land than one hundred and sixty acres he is entitled to have it made up to one hundred and sixty acres if he has made his proof and received his warrant for less than that quantity, or has a certificate upon which he is entitled to have scrip instead of land; but he has this right only in case he has a warrant for some land and wants to make up the quantity of one hundred and sixty acres.

Mr. BARBER. The provision of the Mexican war bounty-land law is this: If they were entitled by reason of length of service to a land warrant for one hundred and sixty acres they could obtain a certificate to that effect, and in lieu of the issue of a land warrant could have scrip to the amount of $100 issued from the Treasury of the United States, drawing 6 per cent. interest, payable semi-annually, the principal payable at the pleasure of the Government. If they received forty acres of land they were entitled to a certificate for twenty-five dollars. Now, if a soldier has applied and obtained a warrant for only forty acres, and has taken either scrip or a land warrant for forty acres, he is entitled to make it up, if he has served the required period, to the amount of one hundred and sixty acres.

I understand the necessity for the use of these two words applies as well to the subsequent lines as to the first line. It is to allow him to obtain, if he served in the Mexican war, an additional certificate for seventy-five dollars, or an additional land warrant for one hundred and twenty acres. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I should like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether those who served in the Mexican war did not receive a warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land; and whether those who served in the wars prior to the war of 1812 did not receive warrants for only forty acres. Was not the number of acres granted as bounty afterward increased? Does not this apply, then, to those who served prior to the Mexican war instead of those who received land warrants for one hundred and sixty acres of land?

Mr. BARBER. Soldiers who served in the war of 1812 received for that service, and it was a short service, a full quarter-section of land. The Government located the land as early as 1823, because I had a case, I recollect, on the Committee on Private Land Claims, where a warrant was issued, and at that time the Government, upon designation by the soldier in what land district he desired it to be located, through the Land Office, located it for him.

Many of these soldiers I know obtained a full quarter-section warrant. The first law, passed in 1847, in reference to those who served in the Mexican war provided where they enlisted to serve twelve months and served nine they should be entitled to one hundred and sixty acres; and where they enlisted for a shorter period and served for a period of three months they should be entitled to forty acres. And in that law it was provided they could take their scrip to the Treasury or have land warrants located.

Mr. MAYNARD. For $100.

Mr. BARBER. Yes, sir; for $100. The language of that law was "certificate or warrant." The language was in the alternative form; and inasmuch as the section applied to service in the Mexican war or any other service, I thought it proper to use the two words. Therefore, I supposed it would be proper to insert it in the subsequent lines as well as in the first line, wherever the word "warrant" occurs.

Mr. POLAND. I will not object to the gentleman making his amendment as he thinks it should be, although I do not understand it precisely as he does. This is his part of the work to examine, and he should understand it better than I do. If it turns out, however, he is wrong, it can be altered, and if it turns out that I am wrong, it will not need alteration.

Mr. LAWRENCE. What is the opinion of the Land Office on this point?

Mr. BARBER. I will state that I spent the larger part of a day at the Land Office with their best experts. They had examined it previously and suggested there was conflict and variance between the bounty-land law for those who served in the Mexican war and the various other bounty-land laws which had been passed. They indicated the amendments they would like to have made. The first revisers entirely ignored the law of 1847, and supposed the subsequent law covered the whole ground. But that was in the nature of a contract. It was a law promising compensation while the service was going on, and the Government could not change it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move in section 2439, in line 4, after the word "such," to insert "certificate or;" and in lines 8 and 9 to strike out the words "section 2432," and insert "the preceding sections;" so it will read:

SEC. 2439. Where a warrant for bounty land for any less quantity than one hundred and sixty acres has been issued to any officer or soldier, or to the widow or minor child of any officer or soldier, the evidence upon which certificate or warrant was issued shall be received to establish the service of such officer or soldier in the application of himself, or of his widow or minor child, for a warrant for so much land as may be required to make up the full sum of one hundred and sixty acres, to which he may be entitled under the preceding sections, on proof of the identity of such officer or soldier, or, in case of his death, of the marriage and identity of his widow, or, in case of her death, of the identity of his minor child. But if, upon a review of such evidence, the Commissioner of Pensions is not satisfied that the former warrant was properly granted, he may require additional evidence, as well of the term as of the fact of service.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. These are all the amendments to this branch of the law that have been suggested at the Land Office; and this finishes the portion of the work which was assigned to me.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would inquire of the gentleman whether by amendments he meant amendments of existing law or merely amendments to supposed defects in the work of the commission.

Mr. BARBER. These amendments merely introduce parts of various laws that have been omitted by the revisers. There is no change of the law. The amendments are merely amendments of the revision.

Mr. MAYNARD. I failed to understand that from the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The committee have recommended no change whatever in the existing law.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suppose they did not intend to do it. But the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin might have left a different impression; and as our remarks here go upon record I thought it as well that he should have an opportunity of stating what they meant.

Mr. POLAND. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CASON] has some work prepared. But if we proceed to dispose of his work to-night we might not have a supply for to-morrow evening. I move, therefore, that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at nine o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ARCHER: The petition of Maria Louisa Craven, widow of the late Commander T. A. M. Craven, for increase of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. HAGER presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the passage of a resolution now before Congress, inquiring into the unlawful diversion from the legitimate object of certain subsidies and donations from the United States, the State of California, and certain counties and municipalities in that State and the State of Nevada and the Territory of Utah, to the Central Pacific, the Western Pacific, and the California and Oregon Railway Companies, for the purpose of aiding them in the construction, equipment, and maintenance of their railways; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a memorial of the San Francisco Medical Society, asking for an increase of the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the adoption of a treaty of reciprocity to promote commercial intercourse between the people of the United States and Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, in favor of the reimbursement to A. B. Gilbert, or the restoration of the title therefor, of the value of eighty acres of land in what is known as the New Helvetia grant, or Sutter grant, claimed to have been pre-empted by him, and of which he was dispossessed by the Pacific Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of the members and congregation of the Market street Presbyterian church, of the city of New York, signed by Rev. Edward Hopper, pastor, and other officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of the Father Mathew Temperance Society No. 2, of the city of Brooklyn, New York, signed by the officers, John Gilson, president, and Patrick Bennett, secretary, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of the Crystal Fount Division No. 20, of the Sons of Temperance, of the city of Brooklyn, New York, numbering 136 members, and 275 lady visitors, signed by the officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PRATT presented the memorial of Osceola C. Green, administrator de bonis non and one of the heirs of Uriah Forrest, deceased, who was a major in the Maryland Line, praying Congress to grant, for the benefit of his heirs, the half-pay due him under the resolution of Congress of October 21, 1780, and the five years' full-pay provided for by the law of March 22, 1783, for services rendered in the revolutionary war as major and lieutenant-colonel; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. CLAYTON presented additional papers in the case of William Bowlin, praying compensation for services rendered as captain of Company L, Second Arkansas Cavalry, from October 10, 1863, to March 8, 1864; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented additional papers in the case of Alvis Smith, praying compensation as second lieutenant of Company L, Second Arkansas Cavalry, from October 10, 1863, to March 8, 1864; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of William H. Dempsey, surviving partner of the firm of Dempsey & O'Toole, stationers, of Washington, District of Columbia, asking to be compensated for damage incurred by the breaking of a contract between that firm and the Patent Office, in 1868, for furnishing bond paper to that office; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I ask for an order for the withdrawal of the papers of George Herring from the files of the Senate. There has been an adverse report in this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Copies will be retained by the Secretary, and the originals delivered.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Richard M. Harvey be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 154) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of certain tribes of Indians in the northern superintendency," approved June 10, 1872, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Eugene Smith, praying for a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 539) granting a pension to Eugene Smith, of Company F, First Nebraska Veteran Volunteers.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. OGLESBY also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Richard A. Connor, late of Company I, Sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of sundry citizens of Vermont, praying for a pension to Fanny Newcomb, widow of Irenus Newcomb, late of Company H, Sixth Regiment Vermont Volunteers, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 540) granting a pension to Fanny Newcomb, widow of Irenus Newcomb, late of Company H, Sixth Regiment Vermont Volunteers.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. OGLESBY also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Joanna W. Turner, of Wisconsin, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Virginia A. Hindle, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of the State of New York, praying that Edward Evans be allowed to change the registry of the tug Noah P. Sprague and the ship Alhambra, reported a bill (S. No. 541) to grant an American register to the Canadian tug Noah P. Sprague; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1574) for the relief of Richard H. Dutton, postmaster at Cavendish, Vermont, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1892) authorizing the Passaic County National Bank, of Paterson, to change its name, reported it without amendment.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 676) for the relief of Joseph R. Blackwell, postmaster at Litchfield, Illinois, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 38) to vest the power of establishing post-roads in the Postmaster-General, reported adversely, and moved that it be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 229) authorizing corrections to be made in errors in prize-lists, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Edward Healdy, praying for an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 273) for the relief of Butler, Miller & Co., and Hawkes, Miller & Co., moved that it be indefinitely postponed, which was agreed to; and in lieu thereof he submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 542) for the relief of Butler, Miller & Co.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the memorial of B. D. Washburn, praying that authority be granted to the Commissioner of Patents to review an application for a patent for an improved tool for cutting glaziers' points, forfeited for non-payment of final fee, reported adversely, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WEST, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of George Goerth, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth Biggers, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. COOPER subsequently said: There was an adverse report this morning from the Committee on Pensions in the case of Mrs. Biggers, which I ask to have placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Was it a bill reported adversely?

Mr. COOPER. It was a petition, I think. The committee asked to be discharged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition with the adverse report goes upon the files of the Senate subject to the order of the Senate, but will not go upon the Calendar.

Mr. COOPER. I thought it was a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that there was no bill in that case.

AMERICAN REGISTER TO SCHOONER GEORGE WARREN.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1365) to grant an American register to the Canadian schooner George Warren, have directed me to report it back and recommend its passage. As there is a Senate bill of precisely the same effect, I will ask that this bill be put upon its passage now, and that the other be indefinitely postponed.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the Canadian schooner George Warren, owned by Benjamin F. Morton, of Detroit, Michigan.

Mr. HAMLIN. I should like to know what the facts in this case are.

Mr. CHANDLER. The facts are that this vessel was sold at an admiralty sale; and the assistant district attorney told the purchaser that a purchase at an admiralty sale would entitle the ship to an American register; and he, an innocent party, purchased her under this misapprehension.

She is a little ship, worth not more than five hundred or six hundred dollars; and it seems to be but a simple act of justice to the man that she should have an American register, as she is useless now without it.

Mr. HAMLIN. That does seem to afford a meritorious case for the applicant here, and I therefore shall offer no objection, though it does not come within the rule governing the action of this body in similar cases. At the same time I would suggest to my friend from Michigan that they had better have a district attorney there who knows more law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate bill on this subject, being Senate bill No. 485, to grant an American register to the Canadian schooner George Warren, will be indefinitely postponed.

REVENUE-CUTTER RELIEF.

Mr. CHANDLER. The same committee, to whom was referred House bill No. 2076, have directed me to report it back and recommend its passage; and it is in the same position precisely as the other. It is simply to furnish a revenue-cutter now out of use in the harbor of Mobile as a boarding-station for the custom-house there. It is said to be important; and therefore I will ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2076) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue the use of the cutter Relief as a revenue-cutter, and use said vessel for a boarding-station in Mobile Bay.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. No. 517) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to use the revenue-cutter Relief as a boarding-station in Mobile Bay, was postponed indefinitely.

OATH OF POST-OFFICE OFFICIALS.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1920) to amend the fifteenth section of an act approved June 8, 1872, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend the section referred to so as to make it read:

SEC. 15. That before entering upon the duties, and before they shall receive any salary, the Postmaster-General, and all persons employed in the postal service, shall, respectively, take and subscribe, before some magistrate or other competent officer authorized to administer oaths by the laws of the United Statesor of any State or Territory, the following oath or affirmation:

"I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will faithfully perform all the duties required of me, and abstain from everything forbidden by the laws in relation to the establishment of post-offices and post-roads within the United States; and that I will honestly and truly account for and pay over any money belonging to the said United States which may come into my possession or control; and I also further swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States. So help me God."

And this oath or affirmation may be taken before any officer, civil or military, holding a commission under the United States, and such officer is hereby authorized to administer and certify such oath or affirmation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY S. WELLES.

Mr. GORDON. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1759) for the relief of Henry S. Welles, have unanimously instructed me to report it favorably and ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Henry S. Welles $193,132.96, for expenditures made by him under his contracts of May 1 and July 5, 1866, for removing obstructions from the Savannah River, and improving the harbor, prior to the date of the annulment of those contracts by the Secretary of the Treasury; which sum shall be in full satisfaction to Welles for all claims referred to in the report and recommendation from the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCOTT. That is a very large amount of money to be appropriated without hearing a report. I should like to hear the report in the case.

Mr. GORDON. The report is unanimous from the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, and also from the committee in the House of Representatives. There was no vote against the bill in the House.

Mr. SCOTT. I take it for granted that the bill has been reported by the committee, but I refer to a written report. I should like to hear the circumstances of the claim for the amount of money appropriated by the bill.

Mr. GORDON. There is a report made by the committee in the House, which I sent to the desk along with the bill. I ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted in the House of Representatives on the 3d of February by Mr. CONGER:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 823) "to provide payment for clearing the river and harbor of Savannah, Georgia, of obstructions during the years 18— and 18—," together with the accompanying petition of Mr. Henry S. Welles, and contracts of the Secretary of the Treasury with said Welles, letter of the Secretary of the Treasury annulling said contracts, and Executive Document No. 123, Fortieth Congress, second session; also, correspondence of the Secretary of the Treasury with Mr. Welles and other parties, together with report of the Secretary of the Treasury and report of the Secretary of War in answer to a call for information from the Committee on Commerce of the Senate of the United States in reference to said petition, respectfully report:

That in May, 1866, the Secretary of the Treasury made a contract with Henry S. Welles, and in July following said contract was modified.

The contract was for removing certain artificial obstructions placed in the river and harbor of Savannah, Georgia, to prevent vessels of the United States from approaching the city of Savannah, and consisted of sunken vessels, a floating dry-dock sunk, cribs filled with stone and bricks, &c.

These obstructions are shown upon a Coast Survey chart made in 1865 by the United States.

Mr. Welles proceeded to fulfill the conditions of his contract, and gave bonds in the sum of $50,000 for faithful performance of the same, and continued until January, 1870, when the Secretary of the Treasury, without notice and without claiming any failure upon the part of Mr. Welles, but solely because the law officers of his Department advised him there was no authority upon the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to make such contracts, annulled the contract.

By the terms of the contract Mr. Welles was to receive his pay from the proceeds of the materials recovered from such obstructions.

He was compelled by the exigencies of commerce and correspondence of the Secretary of the Treasury and his agents to confine his efforts to the opening and widening of the main channel, and not allowed to take up the dry-dock and the iron-clad vessels that did not lie directly in the main channel, which at that time were of great value if they were raised, and he was so kept at work in the main channel until the annulment of the contract in January, 1870.

Thus, from an error in or want of authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, and from other reasons hereafter referred to in the report from the War Department, Mr. Welles has become a great loser, while the Government are the gainers by his losses.

Mr. Welles, under this state of the case, with no contract, had no other recourse but an appeal to Congress, setting forth his expenses and receipts under the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury, and asks payment for actual expenses and disbursements.

He applied by petition to Congress in December, 1872, and his petition was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate, and the following report from the Secretary of the Treasury was received by said Senate committee:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1873.

SIR: It appears from the records of this Department that on the 1st day of May and the 5th day of July, 1866, two contracts were made by the Secretary of the Treasury, acting under the captured and abandoned property acts, with one Henry S. Welles, to remove the following wrecked property:

1. The wreck known as the Savannah.
2. The wreck known as the Ogeechee.
3. The wreck known as the Georgia, or the ladies' gun-boat.
4. The wrecks of vessels sunk below the obstructions.
5. The dry-dock sunk in Saint Augustine's Creek.
6. The wrecks sunk near Fort Pulaski; and such other wrecked vessels as may be discovered in and near the river and harbor of Savannah. And also to remove all cribs, piles, boats, scows, vessels, and other property that obstruct the channel of the Savannah River.

And that said contracts were annulled by me on the 18th day of January, 1870.

If Mr. Welles has expended more than he has received for improving the harbor under his contracts, I know of no authority to adjust and pay the same, except the authority be granted by Congress.

In this connection, I transmit herewith Executive Document No. 123, Fortieth Congress, second session, being a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives relative to obstructions in the Savannah River.

The petition inclosed with your letter of the 24th ultimo is returned herewith.

Very respectfully,

GEO. S. BOUTWELL,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. Z. CHANDLER,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

Whereupon the said Committee on Commerce of the Senate reported a bill unanimously to pay Mr. Welles. The said Senate committee also sent said petition to the Secretary of War for a report, and during the interval of time between the last Congress and the present the War Department have given the matter full and careful consideration and investigation, and adjusted the amount due Mr. Welles, and made the following report and recommendation:

[Senate Executive Document No. 5, Forty-third Congress, first session.]

Letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, in relation to the application of Henry S. Welles for compensation for removing obstructions from the harbor of Savannah, Georgia.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 8, 1873.

SIR: In response to the letter of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate, dated January 16, 1873, inclosing the petition of Henry S. Welles, praying compensation for removing obstructions from the harbor of Savannah, Georgia, and requesting information in relation to the matter, I have the honor, in the absence of the Secretary of War and by his direction, to transmit letter of the Chief of Engineers of the 4th instant, inclosing copy of report of Major Q. A. Gillmore, Corps of Engineers, the officer in charge of the improvement of Savannah Harbor, dated November 14, 1873, and accompanying papers.

Major Gillmore was prevented by absence on other duty from giving the subject of Mr. Welles's petition the attention it seemed to demand prior to the adjournment of Congress.

The report now transmitted, it is believed, will furnish all the information desired by the committee.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. T. CROSBY,
Chief Clerk.

The PRESIDENT United States Senate.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, D. C., December 4, 1873.

SIR: The letter of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate of the United States, dated January 16, 1873, inclosing petition of Henry S. Welles, for compensation for removing obstructions from the harbor of Savannah, and requesting information, &c., referred to this office for report, is herewith respectfully returned.

The letter was referred to Major Q. A. Gillmore, Corps of Engineers, the officer in charge of the improvement of Savannah Harbor, and a copy of his report thereon, dated November 10, 1873, is hereby submitted.

Major Gillmore appears to have given the subject close attention, and it is believed that his report will furnish all the information desired by the committee.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General and Chief of Engineers.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP, Secretary of War.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
New York, November 10, 1873.

GENERAL: I have the honor to return herewith the papers relating to the petition of Henry S. Welles for compensation for removing wrecks and obstructions from the Savannah River, Georgia, under his contracts with the Treasury Department, which papers were referred to me for report January 22, 1873.

Owing to my absence at the time on duty in the South, and my consequent inability to obtain access to Mr. Welles's records and accounts, it was impracticable for me to give the subject the attention it seemed to demand and render a report before the adjournment of Congress.

Attention is respectfully invited to the papers herewith transmitted. The extracts and copies I have compared with the original papers in Mr. Welles's possession, and have found them to be correct.

1. Printed memorial, (marked A,) containing copies of original contracts, dated May 1, 1866, and July 5, 1866, and copy of original letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated January 18, 1870, declaring said contracts null and void.

2. Printed brief, (marked B,) containing extracts from the correspondence between Mr. Welles and the Secretary of the Treasury, and from the reports of the agents appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury to make inspections from time to time during the progress of the removal of the obstruction.

3. House Executive Document No. 123, (marked C,) being a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House relative to the obstructions in the Savannah River.

4. Letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated February 4, 1873, to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, (marked D.)

5. Printed statement (marked E) of Mr. Welles's expenditures, in detail, accompanied by the affidavit and certificates of his superintendents and extracts from the accounts rendered by them to Mr. Welles, showing the earnings of the wrecking equipment and proceeds of sales of materials recovered.

From these papers it would appear that Mr. Welles entered into contracts with the Treasury Department to remove certain designated wrecks, cribs, and other sunken obstructions from the Savannah River, and that these contracts were based upon the Coast Survey chart, made in December, 1865. This chart shows nine vessels to be removed, besides the dry-dock and single line of sixteen cribs at the main line at the head of Elba Island. I know, from personal observation, that there was a double line of cribs at this point, and that there had been removed forty cribs in all, most of them being from this main line of obstructions. Twelve cribs remained when Mr. Welles's contract was annulled, January 18, 1870, which have been removed under my supervision within the past year.

In addition to the forty cribs, I am convinced by personal observation and investigation that about one hundred and fifty piles, many iron-shod snags, and a number of torpedoes, were taken from the channel by the contractor.

Instead of nine vessels, as shown on the Coast Survey chart, from twenty-seven to thirty were sunk at different points in the river. Mr. Welles removed over twenty of these, and seven remained to be removed when his contract was annulled.

In effecting the removal of these obstructions Mr. Welles claims to have expended $233,235.73, this amount being charged in detail in the printed account of expenditures marked E.

In support of this claim Mr. Welles presents his labor receipt-books, his accounts-current, as rendered by his superintendent, Mr. Willink, and the affidavit of Mr. Willink and certificates of Mr. Woodward.

The books and accounts have been carefully examined, and I find that the monthly accounts for labor agree with the charges in the printed statement. Superintendent Woodward appears to have taken proper receipts for all amounts paid by him on this account, but under Mr. Willink's superintendence no signatures were taken in the time-book, possibly for the reason that but few of the employés could write. From my personal knowledge of the amount of work done, I feel satisfied that in this particular the account is correct.

The charges for the subsistence of employés I believe to be reasonable. The charge for "wrecking equipment," which forms so large a proportion of the aggregate, I have not been able to verify from any accounts in Mr. Welles's possession. These accounts, it is claimed, were lost with the wrecking steamer when that vessel was sunk. Considering, however, that the employés were constantly required to work extra time, the wages paid them appear to be reasonable, and the value of the use of the steamer, lifting vessels, lighters, diving apparatus, &c., seems to be fairly estimated. Mr. Woodward's certificate and the affidavit of Mr. Willink on these points are submitted with the printed account of expenditures marked E. Both Mr. Woodward and Mr. Willink are personally known to me, and are regarded as good authority.

Attached to this account, also, is a statement of the several amounts received for relieving vessels in distress, and from sales of materials recovered, aggregating $40,102.77. These figures are obtained from original accounts-current, with which I have compared them and found them to agree.

The correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Welles indicates that the exigencies of commerce, as stated by the pilot commissioners and city authorities of Savannah, ship-masters, and others, required the removal of the cribs, wrecks, and piles at and near the main line of obstructions at Four-Mile Point. The contractor appears to have carried on his operations in obedience to the orders of the Secretary, and to have first devoted his attention to the removal of the wrecks and cribs which seriously obstructed the channel.

In my opinion, if Mr. Welles had been required to remove only those wrecks and cribs shown upon the Coast Survey chart, the proceeds of the wreck of the dry-dock and the iron-clads Georgia and Savannah would have afforded him a considerable profit on the entire work. Or, if he had been permitted to complete his contract, the proceeds of these wrecks would have enabled him to reimburse himself largely for his expenditures on the other more serious, but, to him, comparatively valueless obstructions. That they were of little value is shown by the remonstrance of the mayor and city council of Savannah, referred to in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury (printed document marked C) herewith transmitted, page 17.

The facts of the case seem to be that, in executing in good faith a contract, the existence of which was known to Congress, as well as to the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and therefore a presumably legal one, Mr. Welles accomplished an important public improvement at a heavy personal cost. No default, on his part, is alleged. The annulment of his contract, before he had taken up the most valuable of the wrecks, deprived him of the only legitimate means he possessed under it to reimburse himself for money actually expended by him. In addition, I deem it at least questionable whether the same work could have been done by the United States at that time, under the contract system or otherwise, at a less cost than that incurred by Mr. Welles.

I therefore consider his claim for $250,000 a just one. and recommend its payment.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. A. GILLMORE,
Major of Engineers, Brevet Major-General, U. S. A.

Brigadier-General A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Chief of Engineers, U. S. A., Washington, D. C.

Your committee further report:

Congress would have been compelled to have made appropriations to open this channel of commerce, and have made appropriations since the annulment of this contract to the amount of $100,000, to proceed with the work, and new appropriations are annually granted by Congress for the same kinds of works performed by Mr. Welles for the benefit of commerce and navigation.

In view of all the facts and investigation, this committee report favorably, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, this bill appropriates a very large sum of money. I do not know how it is with other Senators, but I have listened to the reading of the report very carefully, and I should want to know two or three other things which I cannot gather from the report, before I could vote for the bill with any satisfaction to myself. I desire to say in the first place, however, and for the first time in my life, that this and all kindred claims should go to the Committee on Claims. I have never said this before, because I have always heretofore been associated with that committee myself, and I did not know but that it might look like fighting for my own jurisdiction, which I never was at all jealous of; but we have a committee created for the express purpose of investigating just such matters, and I think all of them should go to that committee, that we may have one rule of adjudication in the Senate, if that be possible to get. Now, will the Senator from Georgia be good enough to state what was the consideration to be paid to the contractor, Mr. Welles, for removing these obstructions?

Mr. GORDON. The contract with the Government allowed Mr. Welles the property he recovered. That was the original contract. The Secretary of the Treasury annulled that contract and ordered Mr. Welles upon a different line of work entirely from the original contract; and the officer of the Government, General Gillmore, on examination, declares in his report that if Welles had been allowed to go on as per contract with the Government, he would have made a handsome amount of money out of his contract. That contract was annulled by the Government, and Mr. Welles expended money——

Mr. HOWE. Then this is to pay him for what he would have made.

Mr. GORDON. Not at all. It is to pay him for money that he expended in executing orders of the Department. I should be very glad if the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM,] who, with the former Secretary of the Treasury, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] was the sub-committee on this subject, would explain to the Senator from Wisconsin the details of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I should like——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like to know whether there is objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is the bill reported this morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is reported this morning.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I object.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I wish the Senator would withdraw his objection. I think the bill can be passed in two minutes. I will make a brief explanation.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope, by unanimous consent, the Senator from Connecticut will be permitted to make an explanation for a couple of minutes.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope so, too. Nobody will object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill being reported from a committee to-day, when objection is made to its consideration it is laid aside; but the Senator from Michigan asks that the Senator from Connecticut have unanimous consent to make a few remarks on the subject. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I will state, then, as briefly as I can, that the Secretary of the Treasury made a contract with Henry S. Welles to clear the Savannah River of certain obstructions. They consisted of certain vessels and of cribs filled with stone and with brick. The contract with Mr. Welles was that he should receive as compensation for his work the proceeds of the wrecks and obstructions which he recovered. After he had gone on with this work for some time, the Secretary of the Treasury who was the successor to Mr. McCulloch was advised by one of his legal officers that it had not been competent, under the law, for his predecessor to make the contract with Mr. Welles, and therefore the Secretary annulled that contract, leaving Mr. Welles precisely in the condition in which he must stop where he was—break off from his work. By the pressure of the city authorities of Savannah he had removed those obstructions which, perhaps, were the most important to commerce, but which were less remunerative to him; and, therefore, he was broken off at a time when his loss was very heavy.

Now, whether he shall receive an amount equal to what he might have made, or not, is a question. The committee did not feel that he should. This same matter was before the committee at the last Congress, and they reported in favor of a bill allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the account equitably and pay it. That bill did not pass the House. But since that time this matter has been referred to the Chief Engineer, and he reports the cost of the work to Mr. Welles, giving the items in detail, saving only this: an estimate is made of what it was worth to supply certain implements which he used, so that as to these implements he gives, not the actual cost, but the value estimated by competent engineers. Here is a detailed account of the wages paid, of the amount paid for subsistence of the men, and all the expenses except what I have stated, and claimed to be accurate. Upon this statement, Major Gillmore reports that Mr. Welles had expended a certain sum, and from that, if he deducts $40,000 which he has received, he will be entitled to $193,000 actual cost; but he thinks he ought to have $250,000. The bill recommended by the Committee on Commerce, and which has passed the House, does not yield to the suggestion of Major Gillmore, but proposes to pay the $193,000, the sum of actual cost to Mr. Welles, as near as that can be ascertained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa withdraw his objection?

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to its consideration, if we can have a vote on the bill at once. My object in making the objection was that I did not want a bill I have in charge to be obstructed by this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be regarded as before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY PAYMASTERS.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call up Senate bill No. 320, to increase the Pay Department of the Army. This bill authorizes the appointment of some paymasters, which are required, in pursuance of a recommendation of the Secretary of War, the Paymaster-General, and the President. A number of deaths have reduced the corps down to forty-four; and they recommend more than this bill grants. This bill provides for an increase up to fifty. I ask the Senate to allow the bill now to be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him. It will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on Military Affairs propose an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the number of paymasters is hereby established at fifty, instead of sixty, as was designated in the eighteenth section of the act of July 28, 1866; said paymasters to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry.

SEC. 2. That so much of said eighteenth section as relates to the persons from whom said paymasters shall be selected be, and is hereby, repealed.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the present number of paymasters now in service?

Mr. LOGAN. Forty-four.

Mr. SHERMAN. This increases them six.

Mr. LOGAN. This makes the number fifty. The Pay Department was established at sixty in 1866. It was afterward provided, however, that no promotion or appointment should be made in any of the staff corps. Under that this corps has been reduced to forty-four; and the Paymaster-General and the Secretary of War recommend the filling up to the number of fifty-two, allowed by the act of 1870. But after consulting with different persons it was concluded that fifty would probably be sufficient to do the duties of paymasters of the Army. Hence we provide that the number shall be established at fifty, instead of sixty, as fixed by the law of 1866, and authorize the President to appoint these paymasters to fill up vacancies.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator whether the public service really demands the addition of six more paymasters?

Mr. LOGAN. The only means I have of judging is what the Paymaster-General himself says, and what the President and Secretary of War recommend. The Paymaster-General has been very persistent in reference to this matter both at the last Congress and this; he has asked for a larger increase than we give in this bill. We have declined to do it up to the present time. That is the only means of information I have.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, this matter is brought to the attention of Congress in the report of the Paymaster-General, which is submitted with the report of the Secretary of War. The Paymaster-General, as has been remarked by the Senator from Illinois, has in his preceding report, and repeated it in this, laid his recommendations before Congress, alleging that it is actually necessary, in his opinion, that there should be six additional paymasters. The Secretary of War, in commenting upon that proposition, merely calls the attention of Congress to the fact, but makes no recommendation on the point. The conclusion, therefore, is apparent that the Secretary of War does not concur, or at least gives merely a negative support to the recommendation made by the Paymaster-General. This is a proposition to add six majors to the Army of the United States, and I believe it is not out of place for me to say to the Senate now, that in the Army appropriation bill, which has been adopted by the House of Representatives, there is a provision which reduces the rank and file of the Army by five thousand men.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is out of order to refer to proceedings in the other House for the purpose of affecting votes in the Senate.

Mr. WEST. Perhaps that is so.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me, I beg to suggest that he is referring to a bill which is on our table. He has a right to do that.

Mr. WEST. Before the Chair interrupted me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Louisiana had stated the fact mentioned by the Senator from New York the Chair would not have interrupted him.

Mr. CONKLING. I know it; and I ventured to call the attention of the Chair to it.

Mr. WEST. I was about to say that that bill was on our table and had been referred to the appropriate committee in this body, and that appropriate committee has acquiesced in the reduction. Consequently we are to have an army of twenty-five thousand men in lieu of thirty thousand, and we are to increase this staff department by six more paymasters, when we have five thousand men less to pay.

I do not see that the occasion calls for it; and if it did, it is apparent that by this reduction of the rank and file of the Army we shall place at leisure quite a large number of officers whose services might be availed of in paying the troops. Now, if the chairman of the Military Committee thinks that it is impossible that the proper service of the Army in the Pay Department can be accomplished through the present staff, we might repeal that provision of the act of 1838 which prevents the Secretary of War from detailing any officer for that purpose; and he could so detail officers if we repealed that provision. If it is desirable to have these six men, I offer this as a substitute for the bill reported by the Military Committee——

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the reception of an amendment preclude an objection to the consideration of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that the bill was before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood it was subject to objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will rule that it is subject to objection. The attitude of the question is this: the Senator from Illinois moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill, and the Chair directed it to be read for information. The question is on that motion.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to know if the adoption of this amendment will prevent——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not before the Senate at present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to take up the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I trust I can keep within the rule and yet assign the objection that I have to taking up this bill now. The Senator from Louisiana has called our attention to the fact that we have lying on the table a bill awaiting our action, which bill, should the Senate concur with the other House, reduces by five thousand the volume of the Army. It seems to me cogent as a reason, and also in order to suggest that we can judge much better after we know whether the Senate is to concur with the House in reducing the Army, whether it is well for us to proceed to increase a certain branch of the Army. Therefore, without referring at all to the merits of this measure, and without, I beg to assure the honorable Senator from Illinois, meaning to interpose an objection to any request of his, it seems to me that, if it would be equally agreeable to him, it would be better for the Senate to allow this bill to await the action of the Senate upon the Army appropriation bill. If the Army is to be reduced five thousand, it is very likely that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs would like to adapt this bill more or less to that fact; and, therefore, unless he has some special wish to consider it now, I suggest to him that it would be better if he would allow it to abide the event of the other bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no criticism whatever to make on the action of the Committee on Appropriations, nor do I care anything about this bill except merely to carry out the wishes of the Department, which ought to know what is necessary for it. I have not read the appropriation bill as reported to the Senate, or as I understand it is reported. I have not noticed it. I will only say that for the Committee on Appropriations to take up the question of a reduction of the Army without any reference to the Military Committee of the Senate is rather a strange proceeding. I have noticed very recently not a disposition on the part of that committee or any other, but that measures that have come from the Committee on Military Affairs with regard to the Army have been generally questioned as to the propriety of them. That is proper and right for the Senate. I do not know what they intend to do about reducing the Army. That question has not been referred to the Military Committee. The committee have not been consulted in reference to it. The committee of the House have not consulted the committee of the Senate in reference to the reduction of the Army. They had witnesses before them and examined them; but we know nothing about it. The Committee on Appropriations have not consulted our committee in reference to it. I presume, however, they have examined the question most thoroughly and understand it, and have made a report in accordance with their understanding after examining the necessity for a reduction of the Army. If the matter is to be taken out of our hands, and all questions with reference to military affairs are to be examined by the Committee on Appropriations, I have no objection; it will save us a great deal of trouble; and I am very much obliged to that committee for having taken the trouble upon themselves of examining such questions. If the proposition is merely to reduce the file of the Army, to dismiss the soldiers of the Army, without affecting the Army in other respects, I can say for one that I shall oppose it.

But, sir, I will not press this bill at this time any further. If the Senate concludes to reduce the Army by reducing the number of private soldiers in it, then I shall claim the right at that time to offer some amendments in reference to other parts of the Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois withdraws his motion. The introduction of bills is next in order.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOREMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 543) to provide for holding the district court at Martinsburgh, in the district of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOWE (on behalf of Mr. CARPENTER) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 544) to enable Ann Jennette Hathaway, executrix of the last will and testament of Joshua Hathaway, deceased, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of letters-patent for an improved device for converting reciprocating into rotary motion; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petitions and affidavits in support of it, referred to the Committee on Patents.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the pending bill and all others be postponed for the purpose of taking up the centennial bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Has the morning hour expired?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not. The motion is in order.

Mr. SARGENT. During the pendency of the morning hour?

Mr. CAMERON. I thought the morning hour was over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business has been concluded, and the motion is in order. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the centennial bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Is it in order to move to amend that motion by proposing that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask leave to present a petition which I have just received.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it.

Mr. OGLESBY. I present the petition of about forty or fifty bankers, manufacturers, and citizens of Rockford, Winnebago County, Illinois, respectfully representing that they view with alarm the propositions before Congress for increasing the volume of United States notes. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate bill No. 432.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that that be laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves to postpone the pending and all other orders, and proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. CAMERON. Did I not make a similar motion in reference to the centennial bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania made his motion in the morning hour; but before the question could be put on that motion the Senator from Illinois obtained leave to present a petition. While he was presenting it the morning hour expired, and it was the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business, after which the Senator from California first addressed the Chair.

Mr. CAMERON. I have great respect for the decision of the Chair, but I think this is pretty sharp practice, not meaning to be offensive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the rules of the Senate are all sharp, and are to be sharply enforced.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not want them to be made so sharp that I cannot get up my bill. The Senate adjourned yesterday upon my motion, which, it seems to me, gave me the right to call up my bill to-day after the morning hour. Then I made the motion again just as the clock pointed to the hour of one. I gave way to the Senator from Illinois to present a petition. It was a very inopportune moment for him to present it, and I thought so then; but he is always so kind that I gave way to him; and while I was on my feet the President made a different decision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that, as he understands it, when the morning hour expires, all morning business, motions, and everything else that pertains to the morning hour, fall with it. The Senator made his motion in the morning hour. It had to abide the fate of the morning hour. When the morning hour expired, the unfinished business came up, and the Senator from California was the first Senator who addressed the Chair after that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I remind the Chair that a motion was pending at the time of the adjournment last evening to proceed to the consideration of the centennial bill? Would it not therefore come up as the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion did not bring the bill before the Senate. If the motion had been carried, the bill would then have been the unfinished business; but the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] moved to proceed to the consideration of executive business pending that motion, and before a vote was taken upon it.

Mr. CAMERON. I have never paid much attention to the rules, and I am glad I have not, for it has saved me a great deal of trouble in my long service here; but I thought my motion was entirely in order, and, with great respect to the Chair, I think his decision is wrong.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator was entirely in order when it was made.

Mr. CAMERON. And then I gave way to the Senator from Illinois to present a petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And then the morning hour expired, and the unfinished business came up.

Mr. CAMERON. Then my motion ought to have come up immediately, in my judgment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Had the Senator been speaking on the bill itself it would have fallen with the expiration of the morning hour. The Chair may, however, say to the Senator that his motion could not prevail unless a majority of the Senate were in favor of it. If a majority of the Senate are in favor of it, they can vote down the motion of the Senator from California, and then the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be in order.

Mr. CAMERON. I understand that, and I have no doubt that the Senate now, in their great sense of justice, will vote down the motion of the Senator from California.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, we are now at the close of the third month of this session, and up to this time the Senate has not taken any action upon the appropriation bills except to refer them to the Committee on Appropriations. I gave notice several weeks ago that I would call up the naval appropriation bill at the earliest moment. Subsequently, by an arrangement between myself and the chairman of the Committee on Finance, I allowed the finance bill to be taken up and discussed at length, and, if possible, disposed of, subordinating the naval appropriation bill to it, with the understanding, however, that when that discussion terminated, or was laid aside, the naval appropriation bill should come up and be in order. I do not say that this is binding upon the Senate at all, but I mention it to show that so far as I have been concerned I have certainly acceded to the wish of the Senate to examine that question. This morning some of the gentlemen who intended to speak upon it are absent, being ill, and others are not prepared to go on; and the Committee on Finance are not willing to press the further consideration of that subject, desiring to resume it in the course of a few days. Now, strictly in accordance with the notice which I formerly gave, and with this understanding, in the most perfect good faith, I ask the Senate to attend to this most important business.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are fourteen regular appropriation bills. Some of those bills—for instance, the miscellaneous or sundry civil bill and the legislative bill—are fought over line by line in the Senate. Every line almost raises a question upon which there is a division of opinion in this body. Sometimes those bills take one or two weeks for discussion. It is very well known that Senators sometimes take advantage of the pendency of those bills to discuss other subjects, and are allowed to do so under the rules of the Senate; for instance, the transportation question and other questions which are now pending before us, and even the financial question, may be discussed upon appropriation bills, the tendency of which is to retard the passage of the appropriation bills, and to extend the time required for their consideration. Now, sir, if it only took two or three days for each of these bills to be considered, it would take nearly two months of the working days of the Senate to dispose of them.

An evil which ought to be avoided by Congress, if possible, an evil of a most glaring character, is that these appropriation bills are crowded, as a rule, into the last week of the session almost. They come then tumbling over each other. They come then, on account of the system of which I have spoken, and the habit of delaying them, without opportunity to scrutinize the items; and the result is that the Treasury is depleted. Frequently there are appropriations put upon these bills which, with opportunity of scrutiny, and to point out their mischiefs, or even of examination, the Senate never would accede to. There is legislation of the most heterogeneous character sometimes put on these bills in the haste in which they are considered, by which we find either that the Government is hampered in its operations, or persons who are sharp have obtained advantages that the Senate never intended they should have, and which even those who offered the propositions would not have assented to if there had been an opportunity for the discussion of those propositions. I believe that this system of considering the appropriation bills in the last few days of the session—and I speak from some experience on the Committee on Appropriations in the other House and after examination—costs the Government several millions annually, more than perhaps is embraced in the proposition of my friend from Pennsylvania to be appropriated for the benefit of this centennial fund. These millions certainly ought to be saved; and they might be saved if, after your Committee on Appropriations has sat down and carefully and calmly considered in its committee-room and reported an appropriation bill, it could be taken up and disposed of. It makes a slight interruption in the other business of the Senate, but it is business necessarily that must be disposed of; it is business which, by the custom of the Senate, has precedence of these side motions and all these little schemes which are gotten up for the benefit of this locality or that locality; it is business which ought to have precedence of that other special business which has particular Senators pushing it ex officio on the attention of Senators. The great appropriation bills, which affect the whole country, have simply the committee which has them in charge to bring them to the attention of the Senate. Of course we endeavor to discharge that duty; but these special schemes have not merely the committee to which they may be referred, but they have able individual Senators, who have their constituents pulling them at the elbows the moment they step out into the lobby, and they are continually receiving letters from them keeping them up, as horsemen say, to their speed on these propositions, and there is no danger that they will not find time enough in the Senate. From the nature of things they are bound to be considered by the Senate. Whatever else may be neglected, they are not; and the result is, I say, that the appropriation bills are neglected, and they are crowded off to the close of the session, and are then passed through in a crude shape, to the injury of the Government and people.

Now, sir, at this late moment, after three months of this session nearly have expired, I ask the attention of the Senate for a day or two until we can pass the appropriation bill for the Navy Department—the regular naval appropriation bill.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator from Pennsylvania proceeds, I desire that, by common consent, the pending bill, the unfinished business of yesterday, may be postponed until Tuesday next, and then the Senate can determine which of these other controverted questions it will go on with to-day. I desire to give notice that I hope we shall have a vote soon on the finance bill. Indeed, if it was possible to have an understanding of the Senate to take a vote at some fixed time, I should like to fix a time to take a vote on that question which we have been debating so long. I feel bound to give way now, however.

Mr. LOGAN. Before that motion is made, why not agree on Monday?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is too soon. Tuesday is early enough.

Mr. LOGAN. Suppose the naval appropriation bill is not through by that time, what will be the result?

Mr. SARGENT. I think we can finish that this week. It is more likely to be through by Tuesday than by Monday, however.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have fixed Tuesday, on consultation with several Senators.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection, except that I desire, as far as my own individual feeling is concerned, to have it understood that this finance question is not postponed so as to be moved out of its place.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all; it is a special order.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very anxious for a vote; as much so as any Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather go on now; but the Senator knows very well why I yield now.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objections; only I want it understood that the question will be resumed, and that we will go on with it until we take the vote. I have no objection to the time named. I merely ask that it be completed when taken up.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. So far as I am concerned, I should like to have it well understood that in case the naval appropriation bill is not concluded by Tuesday, it will then be laid aside and the subject of finance be resumed.

Mr. SARGENT. I would not consent to that.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Then there would be a conflict. I am not disposed, so far as I am concerned, to enter now into an arrangement that will put off too long the question of finance. We have spent so much time on it, that it is far better to conclude that than to take up another subject.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no doubt the naval appropriation bill can be disposed of by that time. Of course I do not know that Senators will not take advantage of this bill to make speeches on transportation and many other subjects; but in the ordinary course of business, especially if Senators will confine themselves to the details of the bill, we can certainly get it through in two legislative sessions—to-day and to-morrow.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. There would still be Monday open.

Mr. SARGENT. Monday would still be open: but I do not think any arrangement is necessary.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Let it be the understanding that on Tuesday the finance bill shall be resumed.

Mr. SARGENT. The same majority that now determines to consider this bill can determine to take that up then, and I have no doubt, from the interest in the question, the majority will be willing to do so, if we seem to be dragging with the appropriation bill.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator from California will see that, with the proposition now to make such an understanding, the finance question waived—to be subject to a majority vote at that time, if the naval appropriation bill is then before the Senate—the Senate will not be disposed to overrun the partial determination of the Senate to-day.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator will observe that I did not ask for an arrangement or understanding, but simply moved that this bill be laid aside, to enable us to proceed with that; and the other bill will be postponed until Tuesday, according to the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LOGAN. But that motion was made with an understanding.

Mr. CAMERON. I give notice that I am bound by no side arrangements. I shall oppose everything now until the centennial bill is disposed of. It is a question which must be decided at once, if at all. It can just as well be done in an hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. My motion does not interfere with the Senator at all.

Mr. CAMERON. I am in favor of the Senator's motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. Until the finance bill is disposed of the Senator cannot get up the centennial bill. I move to postpone the pending bill, which is the unfinished business of yesterday, until next Tuesday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to postpone Senate bill No. 432 to Tuesday next, which takes precedence of the motion of the Senator from California.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. From what has been disclosed from the Senator from California and from other Senators, I should judge that the naval appropriation bill will be concluded before Monday.

Mr. SCOTT. If it is taken up.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If it is taken up. With that general understanding I am disposed to withdraw opposition, for the purpose of resuming the question of finance on Tuesday next.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to postpone Senate bill No. 432 in regard to national-bank circulation until Tuesday next. Is there objection to that motion? The Chair hears none; and that order is made.

Mr. CAMERON. Now, Mr. President, I believe by the rules my bill comes up as the special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; by the rules the Senator from Pennsylvania can move to take it up.

Mr. CAMERON. I so move now, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House bill known as the "centennial bill."

Mr. SARGENT. Does that take precedence of my motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. SARGENT. I will not complain of the ruling of the Chair in that respect; but I trust the Senate will vote with me to take up the regular naval appropriation bill.

Mr. CAMERON. Now we are even, SARGENT. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SUMNER. As I understand—I rise for information—the question is now between proceeding with the naval appropriation bill and what is known as the centennial bill. Am I right in that?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. May I ask the Senator what is the sum total of the appropriation in the naval bill?

Mr. SARGENT. About $18,000,000.

Mr. SUMNER. About $18,000,000. Now, what is known as the centennial bill, as the Senate is well aware, is only an appropriation bill under another name. There are two kinds of appropriation bills—the regular appropriation bills, one of which is now moved by the Senator from California; and what may be called irregular appropriation bills, one of which is now moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania; and the irregular bill at this moment I suppose presents as much occasion and necessity for debate as the regular bill; and I suppose when we confront it, it really involves an expenditure, if not up to the $18,000,000 of the naval appropriation bill, yet very far toward it. At any rate I fear that it does; and I am sure that before there is any action upon it the Senate should consider it so carefully as to ascertain precisely to a dollar to what extent it may be carried. I think, under the circumstances, we had better follow the regular bill; and then the irregular bill. Let us dispose of the regular bill; it is earlier on the Calendar; it is more intimately associated with the Government of this Republic. Let us act upon that, and finish it. I know not that we may not finish it so as to be able to begin on the irregular appropriation bill before next Tuesday; but, at any rate, I hope we shall proceed with the regular bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I desire only to call attention to what the Senate has already done for the purpose of asking that the resolution already arrived at shall be carried out. During the last week I made a motion that this centennial bill should be made a special order, with the assent of my colleague, who has charge of it as chairman of the committee which reported it. It was at that time desirable to know whether the appropriation bill could be out of the way or not, and it was hoped that it would be, and with that uncertainty upon it the bill was made the special order for Wednesday—yesterday. We arrived at Wednesday, and the previous special order, the finance bill, was still before the Senate undisposed of. We come now to this morning, with the finance bill still undisposed of, and Senators absent who desire to participate in the discussion of that bill. The chairman of the Finance Committee assents that that bill go over until Tuesday next. This we all know puts over the whole question of finance until that time; and were it not that the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance some months ago had been made a previous special order, the action of the Senate this morning in putting the finance bill over until next Tuesday would have brought the centennial bill before the Senate as a matter of course, and we should thus have been just where the Senate proposed to place us yesterday by its vote of last week.

But now the proposition is to displace that bill from the place which the vote of the Senate then assigned it. The Senator from Massachusetts may characterize the bill which is before us as an irregular appropriation bill, or the Senator from California may characterize it as a local measure. I know the rule forbids me from discussing any of its merits, but I wish to put in a protest in advance against applying any adjectives by anybody until we proceed to consider it. There will then be full and ample opportunity to discuss whether they are appropriate adjectives or not.

Sir, the message which was laid before the Senate yesterday suggests ample reasons why the Senate ought at once to proceed to determine the question whether this appropriation bill, regular or irregular, shall be passed, when it shall be reached, as an appropriation bill. It does involve interests which at this time are perhaps as important as any that are involved in any of the appropriation bills, and I trust that the Senate will not displace the bill from the position which their vote gave it last week.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I shall vote against taking up this centennial bill, and when the bill shall be taken up—which I hope will not be done until the important business of the country shall have been attended to—I shall try to show, if nobody else does, that this project of an international exhibition is utterly inconsistent and utterly destructive of the idea of a great national celebration of the birthday of the Republic and of free institutions, and that the Congress of the United States can do no worse thing than to put their hand into the Treasury of the United States and expend millions of money for any such purpose——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the Senator is discussing the merits of the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I think so, too, and I had just finished what I had to say on that. I am thankful to the Chair for not interrupting me any sooner. [Laughter.] I shall vote to take up the regular appropriation bill, and I shall insist for one that just as soon as that measure shall be disposed of, we shall come to some conclusion upon the financial question, and for this reason: Business is stagnant in the United States now; business is suffering. One set of thinkers say that the reason is that there is not enough currency in the country——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the Senator has no right to discuss the finance question; it having already been postponed, is not now before the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I must say, may it please the Chair, that if the Chair will only give me the same indulgence on this point that he did in respect to the other, I shall be done in one sentence. [Laughter.] I want to say this: that one of the greatest (if not the chief) reasons for the stagnation of business in the country to-day is, that the business men of this country do not know what Congress will do; and it is therefore the duty of Congress to act. I hope now, sir, that the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to take up the centennial bill may be voted down and the other bill taken up.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, this is simply a question of the order of business. There ought to be, and I think there are, some settled notions in the Senate of the United States in regard to such questions. The question is between two propositions, apparently and really proceeding to consider the provision for a centennial celebration, or proceeding with one of the regular annual appropriation bills of Congress. Now, by well-settled usage, precedence is given to the latter class of subjects; and it is so as a matter of necessity. Both branches of Congress—certainly the Senate, for I shall speak of that—have recognized from the beginning, so far as I know or understand, that when this class of subjects is ready for consideration they are entitled to precedence. It is so as a matter of necessity. It is impossible to conduct this class of business unless so much deference is paid to it that when it is ready to be exhibited and to be considered in the Senate, and those who have charge of it are prepared for its consideration, the Senate shall yield so much to it.

The naval bill is the first of fourteen regular appropriation bills to be considered by the Senate. It has been ready and awaiting the action of the Senate now since this month came in, anxious for an opportunity, solicitous for a hearing. Before this proposition which is moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania made its advent into this Chamber, this appropriation bill was here, waiting, solicitous, anxious to be heard; and it was arranged, so far as it is possible to arrange the important business of this body, that when the finance measure passed from the consideration of the Senate, this should have the attention of the body. All this was before the proposition of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania made its advent into this Chamber. Now, to say the best of it—and I do not intend to characterize the proposition under consideration at all, for I have no thorough convictions in regard to it one way or the other—it seems to me that it is not sound policy any way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that touches the merits of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. To say that it is not sound policy? I was about to say that——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator means it is not sound policy to proceed to consider the bill this morning, that is in order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is precisely what I was about to say. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To say that it is not sound policy to pass the bill would be discussing the merits.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Therefore I will repeat that with the utmost emphasis, emphasizing the remark of the Chair. The Chair so thoroughly agrees with me that I am in hopes there will be no disagreement in the body. [Laughter.] It is not sound policy, in my judgment, nor is it in harmony with the established usages of the Senate of the United States, that a proposition of this character should be interposed to interrupt a regular appropriation bill in this body. For these reasons I hope the Senate will give to the naval appropriation bill the precedence, which, upon usage and necessity, I think it is fairly entitled to.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Maine is incorrect in his dates. I believe that the bill I moved to take up was here before the appropriation bill presented by the Senator from California. I know it passed the other House, and came here as long ago as about the first of the month, and I have been anxiously waiting every day, desirous of getting it up. It is important to the people in Philadelphia and to the whole country that the question should be decided. If you are not going to pass the bill, say so; let it be disposed of. That is all we ask. We do not ask for any appropriation now; I disclaim that. I am surprised that the Senator from Massachusetts, who is generally so correct in his historical news and in his facts, should have called this an appropriation bill. Certainly he knows what an appropriation means; at least he ought to know, for he has been here a great many years. There is not a word in this bill about any appropriation at all. It is a preparation for the centennial celebration in Philadelphia. The parties in charge of the enterprise desire from Congress certain privileges. If Congress does not think proper to give them to them, let it be so said at once. I think we could have disposed of this bill in the half hour we have wasted in talking about taking it up; and I feel very confident that we shall either vote for it or against it within the next hour if we once get it up. After that we can talk about appropriations.

Here I must say that I have heard this same story about there not being time to pass the appropriation bills for thirty years in the Senate, off and on, and I never have known an appropriation bill but one in forty years that did not pass both Houses. I think there has been only one instance of the failure of such a bill in forty years. Besides, this is a long session. We are paid by the year, and it is our duty to stay here until the appropriation bills shall have all passed; and of course we will stay. No Senator is disposed to run away and leave the public business uncared for. Why, therefore, should we press those bills now which do not take effect till the next fiscal year, and for which there is surely no hurry except in the great zeal of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. He wants to show, I suppose, (as I do sometimes,) that he is doing his duty faithfully, energetically, and quickly. I shall vote with him to take up his bill at the proper time, and I guess nearly all the appropriations in the bill which he says are right I shall vote for, because I have entire faith in him; but I say to him that he ought not to be in too great a hurry. Men have lost more in this world by hurrying than they have by waiting their regular time. There is time, there is good fortune, for everybody if he will only wait for it. I trust we shall not argue any more about this matter, but take up the bill and vote yea or nay.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I would most kindly recommend to my friend from Pennsylvania to follow his own counsels and not to hurry, especially against an appropriation bill. And now I reply distinctly to the Senator when I say practically this is an appropriation bill, not by title. The title is "An act in relation to the centennial exhibition," and then it proceeds to say that the President shall "extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exposition"—I wish the English word "exhibition" had been used instead—"to be held in Philadelphia under the auspices of the Government of the United States."

That is all of this bill; but nobody denies, no candid person, Senator or other, who speaks for this bill, that it is not the entering-wedge to a call upon Congress for a very considerable appropriation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is discussing the merits of the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania has taken me to task for saying that this is an appropriation bill practically, though I called it an irregular appropriation bill. He went on to show that it was not an appropriation bill. Now I reply to him and say that it is practically an appropriation bill in its character.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will pardon the Chair a moment——

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The most unpleasant duty cast on the Chair by the rules, as every one can well understand, is to interrupt a Senator; but it is the duty of the Chair, as far as he can, to enforce the rules until the Senate changes them. The rules provide—

> And motions to take up or proceed to the consideration of any question shall be determined without debate upon the merits of the question proposed to be considered.

So that in the opinion of the Chair nothing is left for consideration under this rule but the single question, whether the matter shall be considered to-day or some other day; and a debate tending to show that this bill is a good bill or a bad bill does not in any way tend to settle the question of whether it had better be considered this morning or some other morning. Probably the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania were out of order also.

Mr. SUMNER. Far be it from me to contend with the Chair. I am not considering the merits of this bill. I am only considering whether in its substance and tendency it is what the Senator from Pennsylvania says it is not, an appropriation bill; and I was saying that it was the entering-wedge to a call for money. Now, I do not say whether the Senate should appropriate money or not, because then I should speak to the merits. I am only characterizing and exhibiting this bill that the Senate may determine whether it shall proceed with this or with the naval appropriation bill.

I say therefore that this bill, precisely like the naval appropriation bill, involves money. I do not say that you should not appropriate money, but that it involves money. I show it by the authority of the Senator himself; I have here before me a letter, signed by the Senator, which I will read:

> WASHINGTON, February 16. 1874.
> Hon. WILLIAM S. STOKLEY:
> I deeply regret my inability to be present on last Saturday night in Philadelphia to urge all my friends to vote for your re-election. Your continuance in the office you have administered so ably and honestly is necessary to the city of Philadelphia during the centennial year, and it is equally necessary to assure Congress that any appropriation they may make to aid that great event will be watched over with care, and guarded with integrity and fidelity.
> SIMON CAMERON.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is clearly out of order. That is certainly discussing the merits of the bill by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and if he cannot do it himself the Senator from Massachusetts cannot do it for him by reading his letter.

Mr. SUMNER. I was replying to the Senator——

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator will allow me for a moment——

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. CAMERON. I say that that telegram was mine, every word of it, and I approve of every word; but that did not refer to the passage of this bill. Probably a bill may come up in the future making an appropriation, and I felt satisfied that if a man so bad as the opponent of Mr. Stokley was should be elected, this Congress would not give them one cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair rules this debate out of order, and will enforce the rule unless an appeal is taken to the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. I will not try to say any more about that; but I suppose the Senator preferred the election of Mr. McClure. I preferred the election of Mr. Stokley.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. CAMERON. Am I? I am sorry for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Massachusetts insists that this bill involves money. I take the ground that it involves character; and I very much apprehend that as an international exhibition it will be a failure, while as a national one it might be an abundant success——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is discussing the merits of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then I will proceed to say another thing that I think the Chair will not rule out of order: that in my opinion we ought to meet this question directly, and not defeat it by indirection. I am ready to confront it and vote against it, unless it shall assume the form of a national exhibition instead of an international one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. By indirection, I mean that the Senate having made this bill a special order, and, as it were, given its pledge to the Senators from Pennsylvania that it should be considered yesterday and to-day, for us now to attempt to defeat meeting the question by substituting some other bill is not quite fair—it is indirection. It is a question that, if considered at all, ought to be considered now. I shall vote, therefore to consider it at the present time, because I think it may be disposed of in a couple of hours.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the question is upon taking up this bill, and upon that I wish to say one word. I think the Congress of the United States, in view of the action it has already taken, owes it to those who are interested in this exposition to give them its determination at once what it intends to do; whether it intends to vote money or no money; whether Congress intends that this shall be a national exposition or an international one. Congress ought to say what it means now. There is very great force in the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio that this measure ought not to be antagonized against the finance measure. So, if we do not take up this subject now, it will go over probably for thirty days, until the whole question of finance is settled. I would not vote to take up this measure against the financial schemes which are before us; but the appropriation bills we know will be passed, and it is not a matter of any importance whether they are passed now or sixty days hence. We have got to stay here until they are passed; but if we are going to do anything upon this measure, time is of the very essence. I do not know that I am in favor of doing anything until the subject is considered.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from New Jersey says we ought to pass upon this measure, and at an early day, in order that those who are concerned in the centennial exhibition may know whether Congress intends to appropriate money or not. I call the attention of the Senator to section 7 of the first law ever passed upon this subject, wherein it is provided—

That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States; and the United States shall not be liable for any expense attending such exhibition or by reason of the same.

And he will find that repeated in subsequent statutes——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest to the Chair that the argument is that this bill should now be taken up because it is necessary that the people interested in this exhibition should be advised whether money is to be appropriated for it or not. I am replying to that argument by showing that it should not be taken up, because that question has already been decided by the statutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair that is equivalent to deciding that it ought never be taken up. That refers to the merits of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I am not saying that it should never be taken up, but simply that there is no hurry to take it up. Being in order, therefore, I will not repeat what I said. It seems to me it is a sufficient answer to the honorable Senator from New Jersey.

But I wish to remove one misapprehension, if such has been created upon the minds of Senators, as to the time this centennial bill will occupy if it is now taken up, or taken up at any time. It is a mistake to suppose that this bill can be disposed of in an hour, or in two hours. I have been notified by Senators around me and on the other side of the Chamber that they intend to address the Senate at length upon the bill in opposition to it; and Senators on the other side know, of course, whether they will allow those speeches to go unanswered, or whether they intend to make a fight for their bill. Certainly, if we intend to embark in this discussion, it will take some time. Therefore I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we are deceived if we suppose that this bill is to be disposed of almost immediately.

The Senator from Pennsylvania says that he has never known an instance, but one, where the appropriation bills have not passed. That is true. I do not object that appropriation bills do not get through in some shape. I object to the manner in which they get through, and the time in which they get through. In the very last Congress an appropriation bill appropriating twenty-two millions of money from the United States Treasury was passed, and there was not time to send it to a committee of conference to reconcile the conflicting votes between the two Houses, and one House had to take without reading the amendments which were put upon it by the other, which embraced several millions, and then there was a difficulty in getting the bill enrolled so as to be ready for the President's signature before the adjournment. That is passing appropriation bills, I admit; but is it a proper passing of them? Is that giving due attention to the people's business? Certainly it is not. While this is an exaggerated instance, it is an instance of the kind of legislation which is done when we pass these large appropriation bills. Against that I protest. I insist that we ought to have some of the deliberative time of the Senate, some of the earlier months of the session, to pass upon these important measures, and then, if there are local bills or special bills which need attention, let us take them up at the latter portion of the session, when it may not be a matter of a great deal of importance to the country whether they are passed or not, and if they are lost there will be very little injury to the national Treasury. For that reason I ask that we now proceed with the naval appropriation bill.

One other remark. It is said that the faith of the Senate is pledged to take up the centennial bill, because some time last week it was made a special order for yesterday. Was that pledging the faith of the Senate? Does not everybody know that under the rules of the Senate a special order may be set aside at any time by a majority vote? Was there any rule of the Senate affected or repealed? Was it provided that a majority should not pass upon the question, when the time should arrive or the time should have passed, whether the bill should be considered or not? Could it not be set aside by a majority vote? That is all that is asked now, that it be set aside by such a vote. There is no pledge of the faith of the Senate, or of any individual member of the Senate, to the proposition that this centennial bill shall now be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the centennial bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I regret that these two bills are antagonized, for I fully agree with what was said by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] that it is due to this great enterprise, and I think it is also due to our colleague from Pennsylvania, and due to the interest which is felt in this subject in the other House, that this question should be decided; and under almost any circumstances, without committing myself at all to any vote that I might give after the bill is taken up, I should vote to take it up; but as one of the Committee on Naval Affairs I have been urging the Senator from California to bring forward the naval appropriation bill, and I cannot vote to lay that aside for any other bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the motion, and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. CAMERON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STOCKTON. I did not intend to say anything in reference to the order of business on this occasion. I did not intend to be led into the temptation of discussing the merits of either of these bills. The line between discussing which is the proper bill to come up, without alluding to the merits of either of them, and trespassing beyond that line and violating the rule, is so nice a one, that it is very difficult to steer clear of violating the rule. But, sir, gentlemen upon the other side who are opposed to the coming up of this centennial bill have trespassed upon that rule. They have been in hot haste to characterize the bill, when those who might be willing to defend it had no opportunity of reply—being restricted by the rule. The Senator from Ohio, with his great experience, trespassed upon this rule, and then seemed rather to congratulate himself that before the Chair called him to order he had been enabled to put before the Senate his views in reference to this bill. I can say, with the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the time may come, perhaps, before the debate on the question is over, when some of these gentlemen may wish that they had not been so very hasty in expressing their opinion and characterizing the bill before it was properly under the consideration of the Senate.

But, sir, I rose to say a word as to my own vote in reference to the order of business. I presented some time ago, as also did my colleague, resolutions from the State which we represent, instructing the Senators and requesting the members from that State to vote in favor of the centennial bill; and now this morning I find that the question brought before me in reference to the order of business is whether that bill shall be taken up or the naval appropriation bill. Being myself upon the Naval Committee, and it being my duty, and that of gentlemen connected with such committees, by the courtesy of the Senate and by almost the necessities of business, to follow those who have charge of the bill from the Committee on Appropriations—under those circumstances, I shall feel it my duty, as this antagonism has been brought about without any fault of mine or without my knowledge, to follow the Naval Committee and vote for taking up the naval appropriation bill. But I do so, not for the reason given by any other gentleman, and with the earnest hope and belief that the centennial bill can soon be brought up, and feeling that it is very important indeed that the question should be determined by Congress one way or the other.

The remarks of the President of the United States, in his message on this subject, are certainly exceedingly proper. There can be no man in this Senate, or anywhere else, who can feel in the present condition of things that it is not our duty to say to the gentlemen engaged in this enterprise "yes" or "no." There need be no excitement about this bill. There need be no reason why we cannot simply and calmly say, "We will put the bill through and allow the President to issue this invitation." When the question does come up, there is no reason why we should not say how far it may be national or international, or how far they ought to have an appropriation. When those questions come up properly, there is no reason why they cannot be carefully and calmly considered. There is no necessity of anticipating action upon it, there is no necessity to characterize it as an appropriation bill before the question comes before the Senate; but upon this occasion I say that the President is right. I feel sorry that I cannot vote to bring up the bill at once, but I am constrained, in accordance with my view of my duty, to vote to take up the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Boreman, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Pease, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, and West—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boutwell, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Ingalls, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Oglesby, Pratt, Sargent, Saulsbury, Stockton, Sumner, Thurman, Windom, and Wright—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Gilbert, Gordon, Harvey, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Morton, Patterson, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Tipton, and Wadleigh—22.

So the motion of Mr. CAMERON was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1015) to authorize the President to accept for citizens of the United States the jurisdiction of certain tribunals in the Ottoman dominions and Egypt, established or to be established under the authority of the Sublime Porte and of the government of Egypt;

A bill (H. R. No. 83) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to remove the powder magazine from Fort Norfolk, Norfolk, Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 1364) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2201) to render available a certain unexpended balance of appropriation.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1759) for the relief of Henry S. Welles; and

A bill (S. No. 437) to restore William Kilburn, of San Francisco, California, to the Navy of the United States, as an ensign.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SARGENT. I now move to take up the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments recommended by the Committee on Appropriations will be acted upon as they are reached in order in the reading of the bill, if there be no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. Before the clerk proceeds with the reading of the bill, perhaps five minutes occupied in explanation of it may save the necessity of asking some question by and by, and perhaps obviate any occasion for extended debate. I should like to remark to the Senate that the bill as reported by our committee appropriates $17,103,586.85. The appropriations for the current year, including the extra sloop bill and the exigency bill, were $28,048,150.65. For the next fiscal year, therefore, the Navy will be run for $10,944,503.80 less, if that bill as reported by the committee of the Senate passes and no emergency not now foreseen arises; that is to say, we shall get along with nearly eleven millions less when this bill, with all the changes of the committee, passes than we have during the current year, if there is no emergency; and it is fair to the Navy Department to say that they have never made any deficiencies. During the last six or seven years, which have particularly come under my notice, I can say that there never has been a deficiency of any character whatever coming from the Navy Department; so that the fair presumption is that the amount which we appropriate by this bill, although very much less than the appropriations of the current fiscal year or of any recent fiscal year, will run the Department; in other words, the Department will not spend any more money than we give them, and will not come in afterward with deficiency estimates.

The original estimates for this year were $19,251,935.86. After the panic and at the request of Congress, the Navy Department, in connection with the other Departments, went over their estimates and revised them, and submitted as the revised estimates the amount of $17,449,235.86, being a reduction recommended or authorized by the Secretary himself of $1,502,700. The bill, as reported by the Senate committee and now under consideration, still further reduces the amount of these revised estimates by $645,679.01, being nearly three-quarters of a million less; so that the original estimates were cut down by the revised estimates about a million and a half, and the committee have cut down the revised estimates still more, nearly three-quarters of a million. The House has reduced even more than this, by $597,700. The committee have retained all the reductions of the House that seemed in the line of reform or contractions of what might be called the civil service, as, for instance, the employment of clerks about navy-yards. The reduction in the navy-yards is 40 per cent. by the bill; nearly one-half of the current expenditure of this year and of former fiscal years. All such features in the bill have been retained by the Senate committee. The only instances in which the committee of the Senate have increased upon the figures of the House have been in the operative Bureaus, such as the Bureaus of Construction and Steam Engineering, where the expenditure of the money goes directly into the material of the Navy, in keeping ships afloat, producing permanent advantages, and is not absorbed by the wages of officers.

I think, Mr. President, that this is all the explanation that is necessary of the bill as to its financial character; and I ask that it now be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 86, to reduce the appropriation for making charts, including those of the Pacific coast, from $40,000 to $30,000, in the item for the Bureau of Navigation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 97, in the appropriation for expenses of Naval Observatory, to strike out "two assistant observers," and insert "three assistants;" so as to read:

For three assistants, at $1,500 each.

Mr. WEST. I suggest to the Senator who has the bill in charge that the word "observers" ought to follow "assistants." It is a mere verbal error, but I think it would be proper to correct it.

Mr. SARGENT. No, "three assistants" is right. They are not merely observers. That change was made intelligently, on consultation.

Mr. WEST. All right. It refers, then, to line 94, I suppose.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 116, to increase the appropriation for pay of computers and clerk for compiling and preparing for publication the American Ephemeris and the Nautical Almanac from $10,000 to $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. In line 115 the word "the," after the word "and," is redundant and should be stricken out. It should read "the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac."

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) That verbal amendment will be made.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 118, to increase the appropriation for continuance of work on new planets discovered by American astronomers from $2,000 to $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 130, in the appropriation for miscellaneous items for the Bureau of Ordnance, after the word "items" to insert "freight, express charges, and purchase of instruments."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 143, in the appropriations for the Bureau of Ordnance, to reduce the appropriation for repairs to buildings and wharves from $2,000 to $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 146, in the appropriations for the Bureau of Ordnance, to increase the appropriation "for labor, including chemist, pyrotechnist, electrician, machinist, and clerical force," from $15,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 147 and 148, in the following words:

For contingent expenses of the ordnance service of the Navy, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 159, in the appropriations for the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, to increase the appropriation for equipment of vessels, &c., from $1,100,000 to $1,250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines 222 and 223, in the appropriations for the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, to increase the appropriation "for provisions for the officers, seamen, and marines" from $1,300,000 to $1,352,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 224, to increase the appropriation for purchase of water for ships from $30,000 to $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 251, in the appropriations for the Bureau of Steam Engineering, to increase the appropriation "for repairs and preservation of boilers and machinery on naval vessels; and for fitting, repair, and preservation of yard machinery and tools; and for labor in navy-yards and stations not before included; and for incidental expenses; and for purchase and preservation of oils, coal, iron, and all materials and stores; and for completing and erecting on board vessels compound engines with boilers," from $1,500,000 to $1,865,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 327, under the head of "Naval Academy," to increase the appropriation "for contingent expenses" from $30,000 to $46,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 333, at the end of the appropriation for pay of officers, &c., of the Marine Corps, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the office of commandant of the Marine Corps having the rank of a brigadier-general of the Army shall continue until a vacancy shall occur in the same, and no longer; and when such vacancy shall occur in said office, immediately thereupon all laws and parts of laws creating said office shall become inoperative, and shall, by virtue of this act, from thenceforth be repealed.

Mr. CRAGIN. I offer an amendment to this amendment, which is very brief, and to which there will be no objection, I presume. It is at the end of the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to insert:

And provided further, That thereafter the commandant of the Marine Corps shall have the rank and pay of a colonel, and shall be appointed by selection by the President from the officers of said corps.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no information from the committee on that matter; but so far as I see myself, I perceive no objection to it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 341, to increase the appropriation for the civil force of the Marine Corps from $8,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 350, to reduce the appropriation for military stores for the Marine Corps from $10,000 to $9,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines 351 and 352, under the head of "the Marine Corps," after the word "of" to insert the words "officers, their servants, and," and to strike out the word "five," and to insert in lieu thereof the word "six;" so as to make the paragraph read:

For transportation of officers, their servants, and troops, $6,000.

Mr. SARGENT. The committee instruct me to move to restore lines 351 and 352 as they were before the italics were inserted, making the appropriation $5,000 instead of $6,000, and leaving out the words "officers, their servants, and;" the object being to make a separate appropriation of $1,000 for their transportation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator's object will be accomplished by rejecting the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SARGENT. I now move to insert immediately after line 352 these words:

For transportation of officers traveling without troops, $1,000.

The necessity of separating these items is that the transportation of troops is paid by the quartermaster, while the transportation of officers is paid for by the paymaster; and of course they have to be separate funds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was in line 371, to increase the amounts appropriated for contingencies of the Marine Corps from $15,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has now been read through.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move to amend on page 7, line 161, by inserting the words "expenses of recruiting," after the word "for." It does not increase the appropriation at all, but these words were omitted by mistake.

Mr. SARGENT. And omitted from the Book of Estimates evidently.

Mr. CRAGIN. Yes, sir; I have a letter from the head of the Bureau on the subject.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN. I would say that the Committee on Naval Affairs proposed an amendment which was sent to the Committee on Appropriations, to abolish the grade of commodore; but at the suggestion of the Committee on Appropriations that this was special legislation, the Committee on Naval Affairs have concluded not to offer the amendment, but to bring the proposition forward in a separate bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 1015) to authorize the President to accept for citizens of the United States the jurisdiction of certain tribunals in the Ottoman dominions and Egypt, established or to be established under the authority of the Sublime Porte and of the government of Egypt—to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A bill (H. R. No. 83) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to remove the powder magazine from Fort Norfolk, Norfolk, Virginia—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (H. R. No. 1364) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855—to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (H. R. No. 2201) to render available a certain unexpended balance of appropriation—to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the centennial bill.

Mr. SUMNER. There are Senators interested in that subject who have left the Chamber, not anticipating that it would come up, and I think it is hardly fair to them. There is the Senator from Ohio, who said something on the subject to-day, and who, it is known, would like to be heard upon it. I think there can be no harm in the Senate taking it up and making it the special order for to-morrow. I shall make no objection to that, but shall be very willing then to go on with it.

Mr. SCOTT. It is well known that the Senate Chamber may be thin at the time when a bill of this character is under consideration, but that the Senators can all be had within a very few moments for the purpose of proceeding with the bill; and I presume none of the Senators had any other idea than that the centennial bill would be resumed whenever the naval appropriation bill was out of the way. I have no doubt, from what has already transpired, that if this bill shall be taken up, as it was anticipated it would be, the discussion which will take place upon it will give ample time to have a full Senate before we shall reach a vote upon it; and certainly it is not as important, in many of its aspects, as the bill which has just been disposed of; and it is to be presumed that we ought to dispose of business of this character whenever it can be properly reached. I hope, therefore, it will be taken up, and I have no doubt there will be a full enough Senate to consider it.

Mr. SUMNER. Well, Mr. President, I think that taking it up now would be in the nature of a surprise. I submit that to my friend. Senators have left the Chamber who are interested in the measure, because, after what had passed, they imagined that the naval appropriation bill would occupy at least all of to-day, if not to-morrow. Now, I think that the Senator ought to profit by the opportunity and agree to make it the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Massachusetts will permit me to say that, this appropriation bill having been disposed of, I acted in the absence of my colleague who has charge of this bill. He has since come into the Senate, and any appeals on that subject should now be directed to him. I, of course, stand by the motion which I made; but he has charge of the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. As the Senator's colleague has just come into the Chamber, he is not perhaps aware that the naval appropriation bill is disposed of, and that the Senator from Pennsylvania on my left [Mr. SCOTT] moves to proceed with the consideration of what is known as the centennial bill. I suggest that as Senators are out of their seats now, not anticipating that this would come up to-day, it would be fair, it would be less in the nature of a surprise, if the Senator consented to make this bill the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock, and then he would have the day before him.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I will consent to the suggestion if the Senator will assist me to-morrow in getting it up.

Mr. SUMNER. I will.

Mr. CAMERON. Then I move——

Mr. SCOTT. I suggest to my colleague that there shall be a further understanding. I do not know what may be taken up next, but this as a special order would be displaced by the unfinished business, if any should be left to-day.

Mr. SUMNER. If there is no other business before the Senate, this might be taken up now, and then the Senate might go into executive session.

Mr. SARGENT. I think that would be better.

Mr. SUMNER. That would leave this the unfinished business.

Mr. HAMLIN. I would suggest that this bill be now taken up, then that it be laid aside informally. It will, therefore, when the Senate adjourns, be the unfinished business, and will not be within the control of any one objection.

Mr. SUMNER. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to proceed to the consideration of the centennial bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and it is before the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT. I believe the understanding was that when taken up that bill should be laid aside informally until to-morrow. I suggest that we go to the Calendar; and if that is not agreed to, I shall move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 161.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Calendar be postponed, and that the bill referred to by him be taken up.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is the first bill on the Calendar.

LIQUOR-TRAFFIC COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The centennial bill is laid aside informally, and the Calendar will be proceeded with. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to suggest that, on conference with the Senator from Maine who offered this amendment to insert $10,000, I propose to change it and to make the amount $5,000. I am sure he has no objection. To get the question before the Senate, I move to amend by striking out $10,000 and inserting $5,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion would not be in order at the present time. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BAYARD. What is that amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the second section of the committee's amendment by striking out the words "the amount necessary," in line 8, and inserting "for this purpose the sum of $10,000."

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I have no objection, but, on the contrary, I approve of a limitation of the amount to be appropriated for this undertaking; but I have been unable to satisfy myself that the proposition is one that comes within the proper jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States. The commission may be termed a roving one. It is to procure information—statistics which are to be made the basis of some future legislation on the subject of the traffic in alcoholic drinks in the several States. However desirable it may be to have statistics on a subject so important as this, no one will doubt that, unless the Congress of the United States is to legislate in regard to the subject, the accumulation of statistics had better be left to the State governments, which alone have proper jurisdiction of it.

I would thank any gentleman who is interested in the passage of this bill to point out under what clause of the Constitution of the United States the power exists for Congress to legislate at all in respect of these matters of temperance, or intemperance, in the several States. I know of none. I can imagine no grant of power in the Federal Constitution that will warrant the enactment of a law by the Government of the United States to enter a State and assume so large a portion of its necessary police powers. Now, sir, if the matter inquired of is not a matter of Federal cognizance, we should have nothing to do with it. If it be a matter which, as I believe, is properly and solely, under our system of government, committed to the charge of the several States, then I submit that Congress should leave these inquiries to be set on foot and conducted by the several States.

Mr. President, one of the troubles of our times is that so many very well-meaning and respectable persons consider that everything that is right in itself should necessarily be performed by the Congress of the United States, forgetting that this is a Government of limited, enumerated, and delegated powers, and that the desirability of a measure is no test whatever of the right of Congress to enact it into law. I believe, sir, it is an indifference to this truth, and it is a disregard of this truth, that has led this country into most of the difficulties from which we have suffered and which still surround us.

No one will deny the evil, the vice of intemperance; but how is it proposed to meet and punish it? My answer is, it must be left to the police powers of the communities where the vice exists. The States have full power and control over this subject, and each State punishes the offense according to its own discretion. If, then, as I suppose, it is not within the power of the Congress of the United States to assume and control this class of cases, then the proposed commission leads to an end which it would be unlawful to follow to its consequences.

There is no doubt that the legislation which is hinted at by this bill is Federal legislation, and there is no doubt that Federal legislation on this subject would be a usurpation of power; and, as I said before, I would like some friend of this measure to point out some authority under the Constitution for Congress to legislate on this subject.

Mr. President, there are some subjects which are clearly within the domain of law. There are others which are as clearly within the domain of morals. There are some the jurisdiction of which may be considered doubtful. But there can be no doubt—and this remark applies to general legislation, not simply to the legislation of the Congress of the United States, which must be under the limitations of the Federal Constitution, but it applies, as I say, to general legislation—that whether the subject proposed to be acted upon is properly within the domain of law or the domain of morals is not always easily to be decided. There can be no doubt that sumptuary laws are rather within the domain of morals than of law; and the result has been that they always have been considered odious among all free peoples, objectionable, difficult of execution, and their enactment or execution has generally been abandoned. One difficulty, therefore, respecting this question of enforced temperance, is that all the laws in relation to it partake in their nature of sumptuary laws; they are in themselves invasions of that right of individual action, that control of personal tastes guided by personal predilection and by individual constitutional peculiarities, which each man should be left to judge of for himself, and the interference with which he justly considers an unauthorized invasion of his personal liberty.

Mr. President, this bill proposes that a commission shall be appointed by the President of the United States, to consist of five persons, who shall "investigate the alcoholic liquor traffic in its economic, moral, criminal, and scientific aspects, in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people; and also to inquire and take testimony as to the practical results of license and restrictive legislation for the prevention of intemperance in the several States."

What have we to do with the practical results of legislation "in the several States?" If the results are unfavorable, what power has Congress to correct it "in the several States?"

As I said before, if legislation is to come of this inquiry, to make it lawful it must be enacted by "the several States." The States have the fullest opportunity of gathering this information and of judging of its weight, according to their own discretion. Congress can have no lawful authority over the subject; and yet I can well understand that this commission hints at an attempt to be made hereafter, by a law of the United States, to prohibit, to trammel, to interfere with the rights of the States and of the people of the States to control this question according to their own discretion.

It seems to me, sir, that the plain object of this bill and this commission is to allow the advocates of what I may term the political temperance movement to obtain a budget of what they would be pleased to call "statistics" to brandish before the eyes of Congress and of the State Legislatures, so as to demand prohibitory legislation in regard to the sale of alcoholic drinks.

Mr. President, this is a very serious question. The Government of the United States has already seen fit to impose a heavy tax upon this branch of business, by which it is expressly legitimized. The revenues to carry on this Government, to the amount of $60,000,000 a year and upward, are derived from the taxes on distilled spirits and malt liquors. After that follow some forty-odd millions of dollars derived from the tax upon tobacco. The great bulk of our internal revenue is derived from the three sources—alcohol, malt liquors, and tobacco—a total of upward of $100,000,000 per annum.

This is a question of broad public policy, and this vast revenue is drawn from a business conducted under the license of the Government, under the strict supervision of Government agents, in regard to whose returns and accounts there is no necessity for a commission; for the most minute and thorough details of the whole business are in the hands of the proper officials, who can give all information desired on the subject.

So far, then, as to the domain of law, the facts are before the country and easily attainable upon the application of any citizen at the proper Department. Now, by far the major proportion of this production of alcohol is consumed as a beverage. A large portion of it is used for scientific, medicinal, and mechanical purposes, but all used under regulations of law, all a source of enormous revenue to the Government, making other taxation unnecessary.

Now, sir, a great portion of the information desired to be obtained by this commission can be had from the census reports. The statistics of mortality will disclose to any accountant who will take the trouble to sift them the reports through the agents of the Government of the deaths which have occurred all over the United States in the last decade arising from intemperance and kindred causes; and I submit that with the enormous expense to which the country has already gone for the purpose of procuring such information, if that be not correct and reliable, if statistics obtained at so much cost, superintended and tabulated with so much ability as those contained in the last census report cannot be relied upon, how absurd it is to suppose that five volunteers, with a single secretary, can, within the space of a single year, be able to obtain more, and more reliable, facts on the same subject. It seems plain to me, therefore, that the information desired can be well obtained from the public documents which have been compiled at so vast an expense and with so much labor as the census report.

But, Mr. President, this commission would be incomplete if it did not connect with the information it seeks to obtain much more. There are other branches of inquiry equally important to the country. This commission looks only to obtaining what is evil in the results of this traffic, and from the use of alcoholic spirits. The testimony of physicians, the most learned, the most able, the most trustworthy in the country, will disclose the fact that the use of distilled spirits in cases of pulmonary disease, and other classes of disease resulting from disordered circulation, has become of late years very beneficial, guided by experience and by discoveries of modern science. All these facts, all these considerations, should enter into the examination of a subject so vast; and yet the language of this bill does not seem to contemplate them; and certainly an examination of the subject without considering all the sides of it would be imperfect and illusory.

Mr. President, temperance is one of the virtues, beautiful and orderly, as are all the virtues; and it is to be encouraged by education and by practice, as are other virtues. But whether it will be admitted by the friends of measures like the present or not, yet I am very sure that the experience and final result of all these attempts at coercive treatment of the subject will compel the admission that the chief force of any virtue will always be found to proceed from within the human heart, and not to be created by compulsion from without. To make their exercise constant and reliable it must be voluntary.

Who shall ever settle and what statistics shall ever prove to you whether care and sorrow are the children of intemperance, or whether intemperance is not in most cases begotten by care and sorrow, who are its true parents. Often, Mr. President, is intemperance—I mean intemperance in the over-indulgence of alcoholic drink—the sad refuge from trouble and pain and other harassments of life; and when gentlemen study the statistics what will there be to betray to them the proof whether it be a result or whether it be a cause? The experience of every man who hears me will bear me out in saying that it is not the happy and prosperous man for whom you fear the evils and the dangers of intemperance. It is not he who becomes a drunkard; but it is the man whose affairs have become deranged; whose embarrassments have multiplied; whose sufferings of body and mind have driven him to the temporary relief which the use of alcoholic stimulus oftentimes affords. What part has been played and is played every day in the creation of drunkards by the extravagance of their wives and their daughters and others who depend upon them for support? This commission proposes to ask nothing as to these causes, as to what the love of dress or the love of jewelry or the habits of idleness and dissipation may bring; and how the embarrassments which flow from debt caused by such habits, may be the real cause which sends the man for relief to habits of drunkenness, to drown his sorrows in the wine-cup. If you would remove an evil, is it not common sense that you should strike at its cause? Would you cure a fever by scraping the furred tongue? If there be evil, must you not attack it at the root? Otherwise will not your attempted remedies be absurd and superficial? And in dealing with a great physiological and moral question like this, are you to attempt to control it with statistics as though it were a question of taxes and income; of money and of measures of value? If gentlemen think they can do so, I can only assure them that they will be sadly mistaken.

The physiology of this question of intemperance is one that has fortunately received more care and more thought from scientific men recently than at any former period, and the fact is becoming, by those who study the question and are best competent to speak upon it, to be admitted that the excessive use of alcoholic stimulant resulting in intemperance is a physical disease, just as much so as any other that afflicts the human frame; that there is necessarily no connection with it of a moral nature. I am not fully competent, and certainly at this time am not prepared, to present to the Senate the results of the examination and research of those benevolent, sincere, highly educated men who are considering this subject in this country and elsewhere. The institution of inebriate asylums throughout this country is one of the most excellent features of our time in connection with this subject. They are studying the laws and causes of this disease; are studying its effects; and they are applying those remedies which I believe to be the only really efficient ones to relieve us from the dreadful results of intemperance.

Let it not be supposed, because I stand here to-day to oppose the assumption by the Federal Government of powers which I do not believe are within its jurisdiction, that I am the less sensible of the evils that grow out of intemperance; that I feel less sorrow at its results, or less horror and disgust at its exhibitions. But I should be false to my duty, either as a servant of the Constitution of the United States or as a representative of the people, whose real interests I have at heart, did I not declare that all these measures of inquiry now proposed, preliminary to prohibitory and coercive measures hereafter, are only conducive of injury to the cause of temperance, which they profess to serve. They are shallow, they are ignorant, they are regardless of those truths which the sensible and scientific men who have considered this subject tell them control it. It is certain that the craving for excitement, cerebral excitement, the craving for stimulus, which sometimes degenerates into the disease which we call intemperance, is inborn in humanity. There never was in any age a people, high or low, cultivated or savage, in whom this taste was not found to exist. It is universal, and all history, all human experience so declares. It is not a result, but the taste for this stimulus exists in the nature of man; and how are you to treat and control a taste so universal, so positive, as that? Do you tell me that coercion will do it? That prohibitory laws will do it? It cannot be so. If it be the physical disease that I esteem it to be, it must be treated just as are other diseases of mind and body. If it be a moral question, it is beyond the domain of positive law; and all you can do is to punish the crime when it has been committed. But you cannot undertake to punish it before it has been committed, and you cannot undertake to punish a taste, the existence of which is coeval and coextensive with human nature itself. Morality may be the object, the inferential result of laws. They should be conducive to morality. Although they may not enforce it, they may prevent the execution of those acts which would be contrary to it. Surely no greater punishment can await those who are guilty of the crime and folly of the intemperate use of liquors, whereby their reasoning faculties are, for the time, paralyzed and betrayed, than that general feature of the law which prohibits drunkenness from being received as an excuse for crime; but, on the contrary, regards it as an aggravation of the offense.

Mr. President, in the world's history, in the history of mankind, it will not appear that the absence of the use of alcoholic drinks is accompanied pari passu with an elevated morality. Of the defects of the American people I am conscious, and often regret them; but I must say that there are many countries in the world where intemperance as to alcoholic drinks is almost entirely unknown, where the grade of morality is utterly inferior to that known throughout the United States. The southern portions of Europe, Turkey, parts of Asia, all disclose the fact that intemperance is there rarely known. It is a vice so exceptional as scarcely to be called a public vice in those countries. Yet who will consider the standard of morality practiced in the homes of the American people and not thank God that his lot has been cast in this land and not in theirs? Certainly no American will be found who would desire to exchange with them on that subject; and this may be said in no sense of over self-righteousness.

I do not understand, Mr. President, the ground upon which this constant interference in the shape of sumptuary or coercive laws can be justified. I do not understand how their advocates can expect from them any other than the usual results—an enforced obedience that will break into disobedience, and drive the parties, even while they submit, into hypocrisy and dissimulation. If the vice must be, let it be an open one. Its horrible, its shocking, attendants may do something to prevent it. The ancient Spartans, we are told, made their helots drunk, as an example to their youth. Therefore, if this thing must be, it had better be public, that men may find the disrespect that follows such practices, and they may be shunned, and may be useful as examples if they are useful for nothing else.

There is a narrow-mindedness, as it seems to me, in this system of enforcing the same class of habits to one man as to another, that I cannot approve. Without regard to his tastes, without regard to his capacity, without regard to his means, without regard to the idiosyncracies of his constitution, you would say that on this subject all men must be alike. There is no sensible physician, there is no sensible moralist, that will not answer that the proposition is false per se. There are scarcely any two constitutions upon whom this same stimulus will have the same effect. To one man the moderate use of alcoholic stimulus may be a source of health and vigor; to the other it is almost a poison. How can we prescribe a law which will enforce the same system as to both?

As to the morals of the question, they are of late discovery. We have had the precept and the example of the wisest and best men the world has known to the effect that the use of God's gifts, and not their abuse, is man's duty; that "God is paid when man receives." "To enjoy, is to obey." I prefer to follow that charitable rule which will allow each man to become his own guide as to these questions affecting his own happiness, than the rule of those cast-iron statesmen who insist on stretching each man on a procrustean bed of their own manufacture, and lopping him off or stretching him as the size of that bed may require.

The first miracle performed on earth by the Son of God himself was to change water into wine; and the Great Book which contains the history of His acts on earth is filled with examples of the usefulness, the wisdom, and the propriety of the use, not the abuse, of those things which He has given for our comfort.

The subject, Mr. President, is broad and deep and what I have said upon it has been in a very desultory and unprepared way. My objections to the bill I stated at first. Without precisely demanding legislation, it hints at prohibitory legislation by the Congress of the United States. If it does not do so, then there is no pretext in our passing the bill. If it does do so, then we have still better reason to stop, for we are entering upon a jurisdiction which we have no right to occupy. The matter belongs to the States. They have full and sole control over it; and I submit that this is an assumption, and a very dangerous assumption, by the Congress of the United States, over a subject which in my opinion rests far more within the domain of morals than it does in the domain of statute law.

Mr. FLANAGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope the Senator from Texas will permit me simply to offer an amendment to this bill. I may not be here at the proper time to have it considered.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Certainly; I yield with pleasure.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, at the suggestion of the agent in Washington of those interested in brewing and in fermented liquors, and I understand that is not objectionable to several members of the committee, but they look upon this amendment as merely perfecting the bill.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I ask the honorable Senator from Texas if he would yield to a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I would rather make my few remarks now, but I am not very particular. I should like to have the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey gives notice of an amendment, which at the proper time he will move to the pending bill.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, I have listened attentively to the remarks of my distinguished friend from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] and with a great deal of pleasure, though differing directly with him in his views. Some of his points are well taken in the defense of the great criminal that is now arraigned broadcast in this mighty Union. He defends him with ingenuity and with great ability, invoking God's Holy Word in doing so. I think myself, however, that it is far-fetched, and will not strike with great force in supporting the terrific evil that is known to exist throughout the nation. Would that I could confine my remarks to the nation; but, sir, it is broadcast so far as known to civilized man.

The Senator makes a very emphatic remark, and one that I shall raise no issue with him upon, that there is great ignorance abroad in the land. That is very true. He says further that those who are attempting to resist the inroads made by this great wrong-doer, alcohol, do not understand the subject. He refers us also to the first great miracle performed by the Saviour, of water being turned into wine, and therefore it must be indorsed by the human family. In that same book it is related of a great judge sitting not precisely in the capacity of your honor at this moment, but upon an occasion when one of the most eloquent men that ever opened lips before man—who I suppose would equal my friend from Delaware, even, upon this subject—told him that much learning had made him mad. I think that is about the condition of my friend upon this occasion. He has studied this question, and he says, too, that if this inquiry is instituted, if the bill should become a law, only one side of the question will be presented to Congress. Now I have no hesitancy in saying that, from the noble effort in behalf of the defendant at bar which has been put in by him to-day, he will be here, and he will defend that cause, be it good or bad. I think it a bad one, however; but it is in good hands.

The Senator says further that this bill contemplates action on the part of Congress. I meet that question boldly. Certainly it does; and if it did not, I would not give a bawbee for it. I want to find a panacea, if it is possible, to meet this grand question, and it seems to me that this is a good start. If it were not, I should not advocate it for an instant.

The Senator says there is no power known to the Government of the United States authorizing action upon this subject, tending to the ability to suppress this great evil. Now, Mr. President, there comes in beautifully the question of ignorance, the word played upon by my friend. I must confess that I find myself in that category. If there be no such power, I am ignorant of the fact. It would be very vain in me perhaps to raise an issue with the distinguished gentleman who asserts roundly that such is the fact, and challenges contradiction or information upon that subject. When you speak of the Constitution, Mr. President, I have never been a very strict constructionist. I might be said to be a latitudinarian, if you please.

Now, sir, simple though it may be, yet I can find sufficient authority in the Constitution of the United States to authorize me to arrive at the conclusion that I do. In that I may be entirely wrong; but if I am wrong, the framers of the Constitution of the United States were likewise wrong. They were not then prepared literally to declare for and against everything; but we must look to their intent. I find in section 8, of the first article, that the Congress of the United States shall have power to do—what?

To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.

There is no question upon that subject. Everybody is agreed upon that, whether wise or ignorant.

To pay the debts—

There would be no issue upon that—and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

That language is latitudinous. It contemplates rattlesnakes, if you like, Dahlgren cannon, everything and anything that is pernicious to the human family—yellow fever, cholera, or anything else. They have the power to protect the Government in all these respects; and further:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

It may be said that it would require money to do all this. That is very true, and this bill proposes to appropriate $10,000. I think it ought to be $15,000. I think these commissioners ought to have $3,000 each. I think, as my friend from Delaware has very well said, it is a matter of great moment; and I have no hesitancy in saying that I should not look to the patriotism of the country to that degree as to require learned men and good ones, as they certainly should be, to make a sacrifice on this great subject. My friend proves that it is great, for he talks of the millions of revenue paid by the manufacturers of alcoholic liquors. That is very true; but is that a single reason in the mind of this nation why it should have recognition for one instant? No, sir; this fell and great destroyer of the human family should not have standing or place in this broad land, no matter what the estimate of the revenue from it might be in dollars and cents, if it is concluded that it is injurious to the nation at large. Therefore I ignore that proposition, and would go further directly upon that line.

There is a great question pending here now, as to the resumption of specie payments. I would go any day, yea, I would leave my bed at midnight, in the deepest snow that we have now on God's earth, and go to the Capitol and vote to make the Government pay the debt of the nation as it contracted to pay it. I would resume specie payments by taxation upon alcohol and its various ramifications. I would want no better subject for taxation. Let those who are determined to enjoy it, suicidally or otherwise, enjoy it; but let them bleed freely in taxes for doing so. Those taxes would bless the nation. If you wish to do it, not in part but to go the whole length, tax it sufficiently high to enable you to wipe out the debt of this nation, and perhaps that might check some of the defenders of it to some extent.

Why, sir, in the great city of New York, which this mighty nation is proud of, which the world is proud of, there are nearly eight thousand liquor saloons. Look what a deluge there is there! There is a volume for this mighty nation to contemplate in one city alone of our proud nation. What might I say as to the number known to your proud city of Washington, the capital of the greatest nation on God Almighty's earth, in my humble opinion? I will not undertake to give the numbers here. There are too many known to all good men.

My distinguished friend from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM,] whom I always love to hear, because he comes right down to morality and everything of that kind of the very best order, in speaking upon this subject the other day said something about the women's movement. Sir, I am glad to know that they are moving. I have never been an advocate for the suffrage of women; but I pledge you my word to-day, sir, that I am very nearly a convert, looking at the noble achievements of women at this day, and seeing what they are doing, particularly if they shall succeed, as I hope in God's name they may, in the great movement in which they are now engaged. If they should do so, I think it would be well for them to take the place of American legislators, because they will have proven to the world clearly and conclusively that they are their superiors. They know the miseries of the human family; they know the woes that they are surrounded with growing out of this destructive element that is so ably defended and advocated by my distinguished friend from Delaware. If I knew that there was a woman within the United States who could bring influences to bear that would secure a prohibitory law that would save the men, women, and children of this nation from this scourge, and I had the power to vacate my seat here and place her in it, I would do it.

Why, sir, I am ready to go this far: I believe we never should have had the great war that existed between the brethren of this mighty nation, the people of the North and South, if it had not been for alcoholic liquors. I charge it to alcohol; not to bad men. Unfortunately there are good men who participated in it, around the social board and in the various avenues and ramifications pertaining to it; blood got up; fighting ensued; and yet alcohol is triumphant.

Sir, I am one of those who will vote against it in any way that it is possible to suppress it. I believe the power exists under the Constitution of the United States to meet this great question. If it does not, then I would be most anxious to vote for an additional provision that would reach it. This investigation opens up and invites the mind of the nation in that direction, and at the same time it strengthens the mighty effort now being made on the part of the women of the land. Let them all come in together, and it may be that before the time of the great centennial exhibition is reached the gordian knot will be cut, and all may meet together on that momentous occasion as a happy nation in the first one hundred years that alcohol has been tried and condemned; and in that case we shall be the most happy nation upon earth.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WRIGHT. I appeal to the Senator from Connecticut to allow us to take a vote upon this bill unless there be a disposition to debate it further. So far as I am concerned, having the bill in charge, I have no disposition whatever to debate it; and I think we might have a vote now and dispose of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut withdraw his motion?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I will withdraw the motion if we can take a vote on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut withdraws his motion.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not think this bill will pass without some further debate. I renew the motion to go into executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. This will come up as the unfinished business to-morrow and displace the centennial bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let the centennial bill be taken up first.

Mr. SHERMAN. I appeal to my colleague to let this matter get out of the way of other business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The understanding of the Chair is that the centennial bill was laid aside informally, and was to remain the unfinished business to-day.

Mr. SUMNER. That is the understanding. The centennial bill is in order for to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I appeal to my colleague to allow a vote to be taken first, on account of the general interest felt in this subject by a large number of people. As it is, it will stand in the way of the Calendar and all other business until it is disposed of. It is certainly a matter of not so great importance that we cannot decide how to vote upon it. I should be very glad to hear the views of my colleague about it, but still, I think, we ought to act upon it because it stands in the way of all private bills on the Calendar. By a vote of the Senate it has been placed at the head of the Calendar, and the Calendar cannot be reached in the ordinary course until this bill is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his motion?

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 26, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

BRANCH MINT IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Appropriations, for present consideration, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 58) to render available a certain unexpended balance of appropriation. The object of the joint resolution is to save an unexpended balance from being covered into the Treasury.

The joint resolution was read. It proposes to reappropriate and make available, from and after the passage of the joint resolution, the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the construction of the United States branch-mint building at San Francisco, California, now remaining on the books of the Treasury Department to the credit of the appropriation for that work, and unavailable under the provisions of the fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of the act of July 12, 1870.

Mr. WOOD. I ask the gentleman from Ohio, what is the amount of the unexpended balance of appropriation proposed to be rendered available under this joint resolution?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury which fully explains it, and which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1874.

SIR: I inclose herewith copy of a letter from the Supervising Architect in regard to an unexpended balance, amounting to $234,176.64, standing to the credit of the appropriation for the erection of the United States branch mint in San Francisco, which has become unavailable under the provisions of sections 5 and 6 of the act of July 12, 1870, and would respectfully request the passage of a resolution making the appropriation available.

It is of the utmost importance that the new mint should be completed and put in operation at the earliest possible moment; and unless the above appropriation is made available, or a similar amount appropriated, it will be necessary to suspend work.

It will be seen from the letter of the Supervising Architect that the appropriations for the completion of this building, including the above-named amount, have not exceeded the amount fixed by law, namely, $1,500,000. There appears to me, therefore, no reason why the above amount should not be rendered available.

In this connection I desire to express my concurrence in the views expressed by the Supervising Architect in regard to the operations of the fifth and sixth sections of the act above referred to, so far as regards the appropriations for public works, and desire to call attention to the fact that the appropriations for light-houses have been exempted from the operations of this act by the act of June 10, 1872, and would recommend that the same provision be extended to public buildings.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL. When this matter was formerly before the House I raised the point of order on it, as the gentleman from Ohio will recollect. I have examined the subject since. I suppose the appropriation is a correct one, although I would like the gentleman who has charge of the resolution to tell me why this money was not covered into the Treasury under the two years' act, as I may term it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt that the Committee on Appropriations in 1870 intended to make a law by which all appropriations should be covered into the Treasury within two years from the date of the law authorizing the appropriation. I have no doubt, I say, that such was the intention of those who framed the sections referred to. But they did not use words that resulted in carrying that intention out, and for this reason: Strictly speaking, in the eye of the law, Congress does not make an appropriation of money. Congress authorizes an appropriation to be made. The appropriation is made, in fact, by the Secretary of the Treasury when he draws an appropriation warrant. The courts regard the act of the Secretary in the drawing of the warrant, which is authorized by law, as the act of appropriation. Therefore we may make a law to-day authorizing the appropriation of $100,000, and if two years, lacking a day, from to-day the Secretary draws his warrant against it, that warrant becomes the act of appropriation; and they have therefore construed the sum as standing for two years after the day on which the warrant is drawn which is called the appropriation.

Now the Committee on Appropriations has endeavored, in the legislative appropriation bill now pending, to rectify what we consider the mistake of that law, and have provided that whenever any sums shall have stood on the books of the Treasury, as liable to appropriation, for two years, they shall be covered back into the Treasury; but as the law now stands they are not liable to be covered in until two years after the appropriation warrant shall have been drawn setting them apart as appropriations.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to inquire of my friend from Ohio if he does not consider this construction given by the Treasury Department to this provision of the law of 1870 as being in effect an evasion of the plain intention of that law?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt that Congress intended to do the other thing. But I am equally clear as to this, that the older statutes did not contemplate an act of Congress as an appropriation; and I am inclined to think that technically the Treasury has been right in its construction.

Mr. NIBLACK. I think we ought to legislate so as to correct this evasion of the law.

Mr. GARFIELD. I agree with my friend from Indiana that we ought; and I think we have in the legislative appropriation bill done exactly what he desires.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would suggest to the gentleman that, as this is in effect a direct appropriation of money from the Treasury, it should be changed to a bill instead of a joint resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will accept the suggestion, and move the change accordingly.

Mr. BECK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to make one remark about this law.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations when the law of July 12, 1870, was passed. We provided in section 5 of that law, first, that all balances of appropriations contained in the annual appropriation bills, and made specifically for the service of any fiscal year and remaining unexpended at the expiration of such fiscal year, shall be applied only to the payment of expenses properly incurred during that year or to the fulfillment of contracts properly made within that year. And then, in section 6, we provided "that all balances of appropriations, which shall have remained on the books of the Treasury without being drawn against in the settlement of accounts for two years from the date of the last appropriation made by law," shall be covered into the Treasury. Yet, to-day, the amount of $72,000,000, $52,000,000 of which was applicable to and appropriated in the year 1871, is retained upon the books of the Department and drawn against, because the Department construes this provision of law in this way: If there is an appropriation of $10,000,000 for 1871, for the pay of the Army or for any other purpose, and then within two years the Department draws against it for say ten dollars, and then two years afterward for ten dollars more, the whole of that $10,000,000 is kept running forever, subject to the use of the Department. The last Book of Estimates shows that there are $72,000,000 afloat now upon that construction; which is nothing but a fraudulent attempt on the part of the Department to control, as they are now doing, $72,000,000 of balances, against the plain letter and intent and meaning of the law passed by Congress.

The provision of the legislative bill, which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] says will require, on the 1st day of July of each year, all unexpended balances to be covered into the Treasury, simply allows the Department to draw from now until the 1st day of July without restraint, when the whole sum should now be put beyond departmental construction. I will ask the gentleman to admit an amendment to accomplish that object, so as to stop the expenditures now, and not wait until the 1st day of next July.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the language employed by the committee does not perfectly accomplish the purpose, I will be glad to have the help of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not, for one, desire to place the House in the position of acquiescing in the interpretation of the Department in reference to the law of 1870.

Mr. BECK. It is all wrong.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to make this a direct appropriation of money from the Treasury. If he will do that, the purpose for which this money is required, being a proper one, I think it will meet with no opposition. But the bill as it now stands puts Congress in the position of recognizing, by a solemn enactment, a technical construction of the Department whereby enormous sums of money are retained on the books of the Treasury, subject to draft at any time; which construction is neither the letter nor the spirit of the law.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman makes this mistake: it is a matter which has been decided by the courts as well as by the accounting officers of the Treasury. We do not either recognize or oppose that construction by this bill. We simply say that the amount of money appropriated for this mint at San Francisco, and which could not be used in consequence of the failure to obtain title to the land in time before the two years had passed, shall be used to finish the building, the money being needed for the daily work going on. It is to avoid the delay of waiting for the regular deficiency bill.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman says the Department assumes the right to override, ignore, and abolish an act of Congress regulating appropriations, and stating when they shall be covered into the Treasury if not used. I think he should go much further than the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] I think we should determine the question now so as to cover in the Treasury not only the unexpended balances now remaining, but all there may be hereafter, not only in the case of the California mint, but in all similar cases. That should be done, not by an appropriation bill, as proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, but by a general law providing that when any money appropriated shall not be expended for two years—not merely not drawn upon—it shall be covered into the Treasury. I think the time has arrived when it is necessary for the money-appropriating power of the Government to determine what limit shall be placed upon executive action in reference to disbursements.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] could not have heard what I said in reference to the legislative appropriation bill. The last section of that bill is short, and I will read it. It is as follows:

SEC. 4. That on the 1st day of July of each year the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause all unexpended balances of appropriations, which shall have remained upon the books of the Treasury for two fiscal years, to be carried to the surplus fund.

This language was drawn by the Committee on Appropriations after consultation with those in the Treasury who construed the law, and it is acknowledged by them that it will accomplish perfectly and completely what we believe to have been the intention of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. BECK. Do you not by that provision allow all balances now running to remain until the 1st day of next July?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. How much earlier than the 1st day of July next does the gentleman suppose the legislative appropriation bill will pass and become a law?

Mr. BECK. It may not become a law before the 1st of June, if you please. All we have to do would be to strike out the words "not being drawn against in the settlement of accounts," in the sixth section of the act of 1870, and then by their own construction the money will be covered into the Treasury the day the bill passes, instead of waiting until the 1st day of July next. I want to put the money at once beyond the power even of departmental construction. Every dollar now taken is in palpable violation of law, and they are doing it every day.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think there would be found a great inconvenience in undertaking to make such a provision begin its operation before the end of the fiscal year. I think it would very much disturb the method of keeping the accounts in the Departments to start off before the end of the fiscal year with a general change of that kind; and, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] suggests, it is hardly to be hoped that the legislative appropriation bill can become a law before the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. BECK. I understood the pressure was to have Congress adjourn on the 15th of May, and that we were trying to work up to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understood the House distinctly to negative that proposition. I voted against it myself, as did the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. Those balances do not belong to the Departments by law; they ought now to be in the Treasury. We ought to curtail, indeed, abrogate, the power of the Departments over them by every practicable means; we ought at the earliest possible day to put those balances beyond the reach of the Departments by any construction which they may adopt.

Mr. GARFIELD. Whenever the House will allow us to get at the legislative appropriation bill we can fix that matter.

Mr. BECK. I shall object to this bill, if I have the right to do so, believing that this money is in the Treasury now according to law.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is too late for the gentleman to object.

Mr. BECK. If a good bill were presented making a reappropriation of this money, and if it were shown that San Francisco should have this mint building, I would vote for it.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to move an amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I agree fully with what has been said here as to this construction of the Departments being in fact an evasion of what was intended by the Committee on Appropriations and Congress in the legislation of 1870. But in reply to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who thinks that something should immediately be done to prevent these large sums lying in the Treasury to the credit of the Departments from being used, there is this to be said in behalf of the Departments: that the fact of these large sums lying there to-day, aggregating $70,000,000, unexpended, not drawn upon, although the Departments have so construed the law that they could expend them, makes in favor of the Departments. So far as it goes, it shows moderation on their part. They have had by their construction, which has been accepted, $70,000,000 that they might have expended, but which they have not expended. I put this consideration to the gentleman as showing, in all fairness, that he need have no fear that during the few weeks which may intervene between the time Congress adjourns (and the earlier the better, in my view) and the 1st day of July there will be any great expenditure out of these sums. I am afraid that none of the appropriation bills, which, as gentlemen know, are usually the last passed, will get through and become law, as things look now, much earlier than the 1st of July. In my judgment we ought to be able to get through our work six weeks earlier; but in the present condition of business in this House, with all the vast subjects looming up before us, I do not see how we can get through much before the heats of midsummer. So that the objection raised by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] that this provision ought to take effect at once, and not be delayed until July, has, I believe, no practical application.

Mr. BECK. I wish to make a single suggestion to the gentleman from Maine. I have not time to go over the Book of Estimates which I have here, but I ask him to take for example Statement B, which contains the balances of appropriations made for the service of the year ending June 30, 1871, and limited by law to the payment of indebtedness for that year. If the gentleman will look over this exhibit he will see that these Departments are to-day drawing against the balances of appropriations for 1871, which were limited by law to that year, and ought now to be in the Treasury. They had drawn over $1,000,000 in September last. Those balances are being diminished by the Departments every day, as the Book of Estimates shows. That is my reason for asking prompt action on this subject.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Balances accumulate every year.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to move an amendment, to strike out the words "the unexpended balance of the appropriations," and insert the following:

That the sum of $234,176.64 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction of the branch-mint building in San Francisco, California.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will not press that amendment, and for this reason: if we now make what would be an independent appropriation it will be without any limitation. If we reappropriate this money, the provision will refer back to the original law, and will be subject to all the restrictions and limitations to which we wish it subjected. But it has been again and again decided that——

Mr. RANDALL. The bill in the form proposed appears to me a violation of existing law, which I do not propose to sanction.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman listen a moment? It has been decided again and again that a naked appropriation for a public building, accompanied by no restrictions upon the appropriation, is to be construed, so far as the amount of money is concerned, as repealing the general limitations applicable to the subject. This was stated by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] in his speech the other day, concerning the post-office building in Boston.

Now, the advantage of simple reappropriation keeps it all within the old limitation, and it is for that reason I desire it shall be simply made available.

Mr. RANDALL. The very act of 1870 changes that construction.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; it does not.

Mr. BECK. In the case of the Knoxville post-office, there was an old appropriation of $10,000 uncovered into the Treasury, and upon the foundation of that unexpended balance they built up an appropriation of $100,000. It is to stop just that very sort of appropriation the act of 1870 was passed.

Mr. RANDALL. I propose to add to the amendment, that this sum shall complete the building.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know whether it is sufficient or not, but this reappropriation has all the safeguards about it. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to offer his amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the following substitute. Let us do this right, if we are going to do it at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think it gets it all wrong.

Mr. RANDALL. No; it does not. I ask that my amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the sum of $234,176.64 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the construction of the United States branch-mint building at San Francisco.

Mr. RANDALL. I propose to add still further to that amendment, "this being sufficient to complete the building."

Mr. GARFIELD. Is the gentleman sure it will be enough to complete the building?

Mr. RANDALL. I know it is enough, for I have the word of the California members that it will be enough.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman object to my amendment?

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BECK. Does not this go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is being considered in the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Why should this amount for the construction of this building not be covered into the Treasury on the 1st day of July next, and be separated from the consideration of all other unexpended balances in like situation in reference to other buildings throughout the country? Why should they not all be considered together? I should say I agree with the object of the bill, but I think it is one which should be met by the House in a general bill. In my judgment one of the worst laws passed by Congress was the one covering unexpended balances into the Treasury so far as public buildings are concerned.

Mr. BECK. That law has saved millions of dollars to the country.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. That law of 1870, covering unexpended balances into the Treasury, goes into effect at a time when a great many of these works which are being prosecuted by the Government should be carried forward with vigor. Just at that moment all the available funds appropriated for the purpose are by the existing law covered into the Treasury. I should like to have the bill from the committee passed, as the object desired to be accomplished is a meritorious one; but it ought to be done as soon as possible in a general law. I am unable to see any reason why this appropriation should be selected from numerous others in like situation, or why this committee should ask that it shall be acted on separately.

Mr. GARFIELD. The only answer I have is, this is the only building for which the Secretary of the Treasury made a special request. When he sends requests in other cases they will receive the attention of the committee. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question recurred on Mr. RANDALL's amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 66, noes 47; no quorum voting.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will not object to my amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do object to it. I do not wish to swell appropriations by doubling them.

Mr. RANDALL. If it comes to that, there ought never a dollar to go out of the Treasury in the manner proposed by this resolution.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 91.

Mr. RANDALL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 77, nays 151, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Coburn, Cook, Crittenden, Crossland, Alexander M. Davis, John J. Davis, De Witt, Durham, Field, Giddings, Glover, Hamilton, Henry R. Harris, John T. So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The question being put, it was declared by the Chair, on the vote by sound, that the noes had it.

Mr. BECK. I call for the yeas and nays. I want a record on this.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 59, nays 173, not voting 58; as follows:

So the House refused to lay the joint resolution on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the joint resolution be changed into a bill.

There was no objection.

The bill (H. R. No. 2201) was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WESTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. SENER. I am instructed by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to offer a preamble and resolution as their unanimous conclusion; and I ask unanimous consent for their present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the House did, on the 16th day of February, direct the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to inquire into the expenses, disbursements, and general management of the western district of Arkansas, since its organization in 1871; and whereas said committee, in pursuing its inquiries under the aforesaid resolution of the House, doth require for said investigation and for any other investigation it may deem necessary, under the rules of the House providing for its organization, additional powers and facilities to those already conferred upon it: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said committee have authority to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a clerk and stenographer for such period as it may deem proper.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to hear some statements from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] in regard to the necessity for this resolution; and until then I reserve the right to object. I want to know if it means sending to Arkansas and making a large expenditure? That is the only object I have in making the inquiry.

Mr. SENER. The committee of this House charged with this duty have made the fullest investigation that has been in their power at this point. They have been facilitated in this investigation by the Attorney-General, and by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury. In the course of our investigation we found a report made to the Attorney-General by a detective whom he sent to Arkansas, which shows, in the unanimous judgment of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, to say the least of it at this point, gross irregularities, if not gross fraud.

The committee, responding to the duty which was imposed upon it by the House, feels that this ex parte investigation, ordered by the proper head of this Department, should be thoroughly investigated by a committee of this House, to the end that if the western district of Arkansas rests under improper censure, the censure may be removed; and if, on the contrary, it has been guilty of fraud or mismanagement, that it shall be brought to the attention of the House and of the country.

Mr. MAYNARD. The resolution employs the words, "any other investigation it may deem necessary under the rules of the House." I suggest whether this is not rather broad. I think the resolution should go to the Committee on Accounts, and let them pass on it, after which we can act more satisfactorily.

Mr. SENER. I do not see what the Committee on Accounts can know about an investigation which we are called upon to make under the rules of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to consent to have the resolution printed, and allow it to lie over. I object to its being adopted now.

Mr. SENER. What will be its condition if it goes over?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent for its consideration on any other day, just as he has done now.

The preamble and resolution were ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM B. THOMAS.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2202) for the relief of William B. Thomas, late collector of customs at the port of Philadelphia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 825) to provide for the distribution of public documents printed by the authority of Congress, and of seeds furnished by the Agricultural Department, for the free exchange of newspapers between publishers, and for the free transmission of weekly newspapers by mail within the county where published. When the House took a recess yesterday the previous question had been seconded and the main question ordered; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER] had moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I move that the bill and amendments be laid on the table.

Mr. PACKER. I withdraw the motion to reconsider. I believe I am entitled to an hour to close the debate on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that right, the motion of the gentlemen from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] notwithstanding.

Mr. PACKER. I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DANFORD,] my colleague on the committee.

Mr. DANFORD. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of supporting the bill reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. In doing so I desire to call the attention of the House to two propositions.

The first is, that we are engaged year after year in making extensive surveys of our Western States and Territories; and we are also engaged in making surveys of our coasts. We are expending from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars annually in keeping up an Agricultural Departmennt or Bureau. We are expending large sums of money in gathering together information for the people in reference to our country, and in relation to the productions of other countries. We are doing all this at a large expenditure of money. My proposition is, that if we continue our Agricultural Bureau, if we continue these surveys, if we continue gathering information for the people, we should provide some means for giving them the information thus gathered.

I have listened to the debate upon this bill for a week, and I have heard no member, rising in his place on this floor, advocate the proposition that members of Congress out of their present salary should pay for distributing these documents to the people which have been published by order of the House. Then why are we gathering this information together? Why are we ordering these documents to be printed from time to time? Gentlemen talk about economy. Sir, it is no measure of economy to deny the sending of these documents through the mails.

But gentlemen tell us that if this bill is passed we will print this information that we are gathering together. At the beginning of this session there was a resolution introduced into this House to print, I believe, two hundred and fifty thousand copies of the Agricultural Report for 1872. Where were our economists then? The yeas and nays were not called, and the resolution passed this House with scarcely a dissenting voice. Now for what purpose do we propose to print these two hundred and fifty thousand copies of the Agricultural Report? Certainly for distribution among the people. And how do we propose to distribute them? Gentlemen who talk upon this floor about economy direct their argument toward the Printing Bureau, toward that establishment that has grown into such immense proportions in the last few years. Is it their purpose to destroy the Printing Bureau? Sir, the footsteps of the farmers in the West are even now approaching the national capital, and we may soon hear them sounding along the avenues and streets of this city, and upon the steps of the national Capitol. But are they coming here to destroy your Printing Bureau and to scatter the types upon the face of the earth? Are they coming here to plow up the grounds about your Agricultural Department building, and to destroy Father Watts's beautiful flower-garden? They are coming here with no such purpose and no such intent.

It is not, then, the purpose of gentlemen to destroy the Agricultural Bureau, or to cease printing to some extent all these documents. My proposition is that, after having ordered the printing of these documents, members of Congress should have the same right to circulate them among the people that the heads of Departments have. Year by year we give, by appropriations, thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars to the Departments of this Government that they may communicate with the people. And yet it is proposed we shall deny to ourselves the right to distribute the very information which we have ordered to be printed. Are members of Congress to be regarded as culprits? What have we done that we should be denied the same privilege that we accord to others? For what purpose shall we deny this privilege to members of Congress? If we gather together this information for the people, if we order it printed, then we should have the same right to distribute it that heads of Departments have.

Another proposition contained in this bill is the free circulation of country newspapers within the counties in which they are published. There is opposition to this portion of the bill principally by gentlemen representing metropolitan constituencies. Let me say here that it is but a small equivalent to the farmer, who rides three or five miles to the post-office, at the corners, of a Saturday afternoon to get his mail, to receive his country paper free of postage; that is but a small equivalent for the system of free delivery that we have established in cities of twenty thousand inhabitants. We not only furnish to those cities marble post-offices, but we furnish them a free delivery. And I repeat that I cannot afford to vote against this bill with the proposition it contains to distribute country newspapers free of postage within the counties in which they are printed, for I believe that it is but a small compensation for the free-delivery system of the cities.

Taking this bill together, I can see no great wrong that is likely to grow out of it. As I understand, gentlemen are not opposing this bill because of its merits or its demerits, but because, forsooth, it may be followed by legislation which will lead to the printing of extravagant numbers of documents. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Will gentlemen stand upon this floor and order the printing of public documents, two hundred and fifty thousand, by a single resolution, and then get up here and deny the distribution of these documents to their constituents? And if they do, how can they go home and explain their votes? The economy would have been to refuse to print the documents.

It would be a saving, I presume, to destroy your Agricultural Bureau; it would be a saving, possibly, to the Government to destroy your printing establishment. But we have not taken that direction yet in the history of legislation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. PACKER. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. DANFORD. The people of this country, Mr. Speaker, are not an ungenerous people. The franking privilege was abused. It was abused in many ways. I have been informed by a gentleman connected with the Post-Office Department of this city that the sale of postage-stamps for letter postage in this city of one hundred and twenty thousand inhabitants was, prior to the abolition of the franking privilege, less than in many cities of this country of fifteen thousand inhabitants. The people did complain of the abuses of the franking privilege, a privilege that a generous people had accorded to their servants. But, Mr. Speaker, this bill does not allow members of Congress to frank their own private correspondence; and it will not permit an army to quarter itself in either wing of the Capitol at the approaching presidential election and send out documents to the country by the thousand and million. No privilege of this kind or character is granted by this bill. It merely gives to a member of Congress the same right that we accord to the heads of Departments, to send to our constituents such information as is gathered for the benefit of the people, and printed by the resolutions or orders of Congress. Why, I repeat, should we not have the same right to distribute this information that we accord to others?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PACKER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD.]

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the free distribution of newspapers within the counties in which they are published. I am in favor of free exchanges between the various newspapers of the country. I am in favor of the free distribution of all the public documents ordered to be printed by Congress, and also the seeds and plants which are procured or raised by the Agricultural Department for distribution. Hence I am for this bill; and in supporting it I only follow, as I believe, the sentiment of the people of my State. I send to the desk to be read the proceedings of a meeting of the West Virginia Press Association, held at Clarksburgh, September 19, 1873.

The Clerk read as follows:

HON. FRANK HEREFORD, M. C.:

At a meeting of the West Virginia Press Association, held at Clarksburgh, September 19, 1873, the following resolutions were adopted:

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this association, the recent changes in the postal laws made by the late Congress of the United States, by which the franking privilege was abolished, the free exchange of newspapers discontinued, and postage imposed upon the circulation of newspapers in the counties where published, is an innovation upon the long-established usage of the Government, calculated to impede the dissemination of intelligence among the people; and, being detrimental to their best interests, should be repealed, and the franking privilege restored, under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent its abuse.

"Resolved, That the secretary of this association be instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to each of our Representatives in Congress, and that they be requested to use their influence to secure the legislation necessary to effect the object named."

C. M. SHINN, Secretary.

Mr. HEREFORD. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the people ever demanded an entire repeal of the franking privilege. What the people and the press complained of was the abuses that almost necessarily attended it. This bill provides, as far as any bill can provide, against such abuses. We were told by the Postmaster-General, when he asked for the repeal of the franking privilege, that it would increase the receipts of the Post-Office Department; but what do we find, sir, in his last report to Congress, dated November 14, 1873? I send that document to the Clerk's desk, and ask that a portion be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., November 14, 1873.

SIR: The ordinary revenues of this Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1873, were $22,996,741.57, and the expenditures of all kinds $29,084,945.67. For the year ended June 30, 1872, the ordinary revenues were $21,915,426.37, and the expenditures $26,658,192.31.

The estimated expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1875, are		$33,929,912 00
The ordinary revenues, estimated at 13 per cent. over 1873	$25,908,817 00
Estimated revenue from money-order business	100,000 00
Estimated revenue from postal cards	1,034,732 00
Estimated revenue from postage-stamps supplied to Departments	2,250,000 00
Making the total estimated revenues for 1875		29,293,549 00
Leaving a deficiency to be appropriated out of the general Treasury of		4,636,363 00

Mr. HEREFORD. Thus we see, Mr. Speaker, that certainly the Postmaster-General was in error when he told this House and the country that if the franking privilege should be abolished, the necessary expenditures of that Department would be diminished. We see now, according to his own report, that in 1872 the expenses of his Department were, in round numbers, $26,500,000; in 1873, $29,000,000; and in 1875 the expenditures, according to his estimate, will amount to $34,000,000. If the expenses of that Department go on increasing in this ratio, what will they be a few years hence?

So far, then, from the abolition of the franking privilege being a benefit to the country, or effecting a reduction in the expenditures of the Post-Office Department, those expenditures have, according to the Postmaster-General's own showing, increased to the extent of several million dollars.

Following upon the abolition of the franking privilege, we, in the deficiency appropriation bill of March 3, 1873, appropriated nearly $2,000,000 to pay the postal expenses of the various Departments of the Government. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the act of March 3, 1873.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the following amounts, or so much thereof as may be necessary, are hereby appropriated for the following-named officers and Departments for purchase of postage-stamps for use during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874:

For Executive office, $600; for Department of State, $83,000; for Post-Office Department, $800,000; for Treasury Department, $504,000; for Navy Department, $38,000; for Interior Department, $220,000; for Agricultural Department, $52,000; for Department of Justice, $15,000; for War Department, $153,000; for offices of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Senate, and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, $100 each; making, in all, $1,863,900.

Mr. HEREFORD. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the short time allowed me I cannot dwell upon this matter. I conclude by saying that being in favor of extending to the people all the rights and privileges that we can, I am in favor of authorizing, for the benefit of the people, the free distribution of newspapers within the county of their publication, and the free exchange of newspapers. I am also in favor of the free distribution of the public documents and seeds provided for distribution by Congress. Hence I necessarily support this bill. In behalf of the interests of the people I think it ought to pass.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PACKER. I yield now for ten minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, the debate on this subject has been so protracted that it may fail by this time to elicit the interest which the bill ought to receive from the House. I desire to express, in the few minutes which are allowed me, the reasons for my belief that the bill ought to receive the indorsement of the House. If I had hesitated, at the opening of this debate how to vote on it, I could not now hesitate; for the issue has been presented by the more prominent gentlemen who have spoken on the other side. The gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS,] the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS,] and, earlier in the debate, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] have made up the issue. It is no free distribution, because they desire no printing of public documents. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] says, "Let the blows fall thick and fast until the Printing Bureau is abolished," until printing is done away with. This is the issue. The gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] fortifies with his voice the same issue. If we pass this bill, public documents are to be printed, because they are to be distributed; and if we do not pass this bill, then public documents are not to be published.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I myself do not understand why Congress should step in between the people who ask for these documents, and pursue a line of action which actually deprives them of their publication.

The people desire the documents. Even the constituents of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] desire them. They ask for more than he has the power to send them. The people pay the bills; they pay for the printing of these documents, and they pay the expenses of the Post-Office Department and for the postal service. They ask for these documents, and I insist that we are bound to furnish them.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] spoke with so much more force and point in his well-prepared argument on this subject than I shall be able to do that I regret even to make allusion to the points he made. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] this morning has also repeated them.

We have an Agricultural Department which costs us a quarter of a million dollars each year. They who have spoken on the other side say, "Let us not print any of the reports from this Department; let the report of the Commissioner be in manuscript, and lie unprinted upon the shelves of his office." They say, practically, "Let our Educational Bureau cease to do its beneficent work; let the Educational Report be unprinted and unbound and unread by the American people."

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] told us about the platform of the republican party. There are men upon this floor, Mr. Speaker, who knew all about the republican party before the gentleman carried off his high honors at Yale or elsewhere—men who understand the genius of that party as well as he does, and who believe that labor has a place in the republican platform as well as capital. Labor! How little we appropriate for labor abstractly—really nothing. Let there be a life-saving station to be provided for anywhere on the New Jersey coast or elsewhere, and commerce raises her voice, and men are forward in defending measures of that kind. Look at the small sum appropriated for the Agricultural Department. This Congress is largely composed of members of the republican party, which declared in the eleventh article of its platform that among the questions pressing for attention is that which concerns "the relations of capital and labor." During the past year the Bureau of Education, by an elaborate correspondence, has been seeking to bring out before the country the relations of capital and labor. Shall we say to the country, "Let that report lie unprinted and unread?" Let the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] bring in an amendment to the appropriation bill to repeal, abolish, and overthrow the Agricultural Department, if, perchance, we are to have no reports from that Department. I already have one hundred letters on file asking for the Agricultural Report, asking for seeds. The men on the frontier have profited by the deductions and the researches of that Department; and these gentlemen who come to the rescue of capital are not the men to tell us what we shall do for protection of labor.

We have been told that we print a large number of documents. Now, there is no State that does not relatively print twice as many documents as Congress. The State of Ohio prints relatively many more documents than are printed by order of Congress. Other States in the Union print relatively twice the number we print here.

We are also told that the Smithsonian Institution must be closed up, and we must know nothing of what these scientific men connected therewith are doing; that we cannot have for distribution the reports of Professor Hayden. Why, sir, the results of one of these exploring expeditions have been worth to the Treasury millions of dollars.

The whole expenditure made necessary by the passage of this bill cannot be more than $50,000. When we are asked to vote a few dollars, comparatively, to the interest of labor, and to give some privileges to the weekly county newspapers of the country, there are men here representing the capital, the metropolitan press of the land, who at once object. They talk of economy, and talk long and loud.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like just a moment more.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. PACKER. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. DUNNELL. It is said, Mr. Speaker, that this is a revival of the franking privilege. There is not one single element in this bill that is akin to the old franking privilege. It is nothing like it in its character or its aims. The old franking privilege gave me the ability to frank whatsoever I pleased, and to any extent. My own frank under this bill cannot pass a single document. I would not vote to revive the franking privilege; I voted for its abolition. This bill gives me no personal privilege; it only provides that I may be an agent, acting with an officer of this House, to send to my constituents books and seeds printed and purchased by the Government for the people for their information and profit.

Representing, as I do, a constituency almost wholly agriculturists, I insist that the parties thus calling for this information ought to have a voice here. I raise my voice for them, whether they be called at home grangers or anything else. Whether they be this or that, whatever may be their organization, they are tillers of the soil, they are laborers, they are producers of national wealth; and the agricultural interests of this country far surpass those of any other department of industry. And I contend, Mr. Speaker, that this small gratuity ought not to be denied to this large interest of the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1759) for the relief of Henry S. Welles;

A bill (H. R. No. 2076) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue the use of the cutter Relief as a revenue-cutter, and to use said vessel for a boarding-station in Mobile Bay;

A bill (H. R. No. 1920) to amend the fifteenth section of the act approved June 8, 1872, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department;" and

A bill (H. R. No. 1365) to grant an American registry to the Canadian schooner George Warren.

TRANSMISSION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 825) in relation to the distribution of public documents, &c.

Mr. PACKER. I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. For several years the rural press of the country have had the privilege of circulating within the counties where the different papers were published those papers free in the mails. It was not a part of the franking privilege. It was by act of Congress, authorizing weekly papers to be carried to subscribers in the mails free, independent of any franking privilege whatever; and these papers and other publications were permitted to receive their exchanges free.

In the common judgment of the country this was proper and right. Considering the short distance for which they were carried, and the necessity of communicating to the people in the rural districts the general intelligence which they might receive from their newspapers and from other papers, it was right that the law should be passed. Gentlemen will remember that there has never been, for the last five years, a session of Congress but some one has introduced a bill to repeal that privilege. And on each successive occasion I have had the honor, in common with many other members, of opposing the repeal of that law and securing to the rural newspapers their free transmission to the subscribers for their papers and the free reception of their exchanges. But in the hurry and the confusion and the excitement of the last Congress, in its last session, and in the last hours of it, that privilege, of which no one complained, the propriety of which all admitted, was swept away, uncared for and unthought of by members of Congress—it is said out of spite. I speak not of it in that way; I say in the hurry and confusion.

Now, I desire to call the attention of every member of this House to the fact which must be within his knowledge, that, almost without exception, every country newspaper in the United States has demanded the restoration of that privilege, while the daily papers in our large cities were generally opposed to its restoration. The issue to-day is between the large papers, that circulate all over the United States, and are sent for the same postage as the weekly papers within their own counties—the contest is to-day between the great mammoth dailies and the weekly papers of the rural districts. I believe, sir, that we ought to restore that law. There has been so universal a demand for it, not only on the part of the publishers of papers, but on the part of all the subscribers to those papers, that we cannot well resist it. The publishers' associations in several of the States—and I speak more particularly of the late meeting of the Publishers' Association in the State of Michigan—have passed resolutions, after careful discussion, requiring the restoration of that privilege. I had the honor to introduce in the early days of this session, on the 15th day of December, a bill granting the restoration of that privilege. I send it to the Clerk's desk, and ask that it may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to provide for the free delivery of newspaper exchanges and newspapers within the county where published.

Be it enacted, &c., That all newspaper exchanges, and all newspapers sent to subscribers within the county where the same may be printed, shall be sent by mail and delivered free of postage thereon to the persons entitled to the same, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. CONGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, that bill embodies my view of the matter generally in regard to that branch of the subject. I wish the committee had reported a bill similar to that, or similar to the last portion of their bill now before the House, independent of any other consideration. I have no doubt that it would have passed this House by an overwhelming majority. They saw fit, however, to couple it with other provisions, which I regret, because I would desire that the voice of the House should be expressed upon this alone. But whether the bill before us be adopted or defeated, I have no doubt that such a bill as that, if presented to this House by itself, will pass. Therefore I leave that portion of the subject.

Now, in regard to the distribution of public documents provided for by this bill. It is a strange theory which men advocate on this floor; intelligent men, men who are loud in glorifying themselves for their devotion to the people and to the wants and the interests of the people; men who tremble like an aspen-leaf at the voice of the grangers as it comes ringing around their ears; it is strange that such men will rise in their places here and oppose the distribution to the people of the reports of the different Departments of the Government, of the acts of Congress, and the debates and proceedings of the two Houses.

Why, sir, do gentlemen think the people of this country are fools? Do they think that the grangers who speak to them with a voice of thunder cannot tell what is bombast and bumcombe, and what looks to their true interests? Mr. Speaker, the grangers formed their association, and one of the principal things which they proclaimed to the world as the object of that association is the promotion of intelligence among themselves, making the farmers intelligent, in order that they may be more efficient and in concert be better able to maintain their rights. Do gentlemen believe that they will ingratiate themselves with the farmers of the country, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] attempts to do, by refusing to give them this intelligence? He classes himself among agriculturists because of the sympathy he extends to the old postal mare that travels the prairie of Iowa overloaded with mail matter. I tell gentlemen here that the intelligent people of the United States are not to be misled by any pretended sympathy with their interests; they are not to be misled by men who think that rolling in clover is protecting agricultural interests. They are not to be misled by the show of hay-seed scattered on their flowing locks or dropped upon the bald heads of members here. The people of the United States are intelligent. The people desire the dissemination of the information which the Government procures and publishes, and which they demand shall be distributed among them.

I know well that, as far as my own district is concerned, I have not half enough agricultural reports to meet the demands of my constituents. I know that they are distributed among the people of my district; that they are received by them and read not only by those to whom they are sent, but by all of the community. And they are desired in greater numbers than I am able to furnish them.

Gentlemen say that these documents are sent to one here and one there, and that a great many people are left without these documents. Sir, if gentlemen will distribute them judiciously, according to the number they have, there will be no such complaint. I send to the papers of my district, of whatever political character, one each of all the documents which this Government furnishes me to distribute. I send them alike to republicans and democrats.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask a few minutes more.

Mr. PACKER. I will yield for a few minutes longer.

Mr. CONGER. I want to say this in addition: I send to my constituents, irrespective of party, to each post-office, in each town, its own proper quota of documents for distribution. I have on my list four thousand names of my constituents carefully selected; so that when I send four or five or six Agricultural Reports to a township, one goes to this part, another to that, and another to that, with the expectation that when read the report shall be passed to the next neighbor who wants to read it. I hear no complaint that they are not distributed as well as they can be. Therefore I shall vote for this bill as it is, although I should prefer that the proposition with regard to county newspapers might be submitted by itself. This is no restoration of the franking privilege. It is not for my personal benefit or advantage, but for the interest and benefit of the whole people. It will be a disastrous day for this Republic when those in power conceal from the people the record of Government proceedings, and attempt to keep them in ignorance of the action or their Representatives. I shall vote against the amendment offered to this bill restoring the franking privilege, but shall support the bill in the interests of my constituents and of the whole people.

Mr. PACKER. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] for five minutes.

Mr. BURCHARD. The principal, if not the strongest, argument which in my mind has been made against this bill is that it will cost something both to print and to distribute these documents. I do not suppose there is a gentleman on this floor who would refuse to have the documents distributed were it not that it will cost something to distribute them.

So, too, in regard to the distribution of newspapers free of postage, as provided by this bill. The argument is that it is a discrimination; that it is unfair. Certain gentlemen say they are ready, in view of the fact that the eye of the country newspaper is upon them, to permit the circulation of county newspapers free to all parts of the community, while those who are subscribers for the metropolitan papers, weekly or daily, will have to pay postage upon them. Gentlemen here say that having the eye of the country newspaper upon them, and caring nothing for the country postmaster, who has twice to do the work of handling free newspaper matter, twice without compensation, they are willing to vote for the section of the bill making weekly newspapers free in the county of publication. Sir, if they are willing to make this discrimination in favor of the subscribers or editors of the country newspapers, then they abandon the whole argument. And as I believe there is a large majority here ready to vote for that proposition, and as it has been fully argued before the House, I will not longer take up time by speaking upon it.

But I wish to say a word in regard to the distribution of public documents. It has been suggested here (and I desire to enforce the point) that if you print these documents at all; more than that, if you keep up these Departments and Bureaus at the enormous expense which it requires to maintain them, you ought to send out intelligence of their acts and proceedings—the statistics and other valuable information which they collect. When you expend, as you did last year, $225,000 to sustain the Agricultural Department, to say nothing in regard to the cost of printing the report, why should you hesitate to distribute through the mails the report of that Department, because it will cost, say, $70,000 annually? It is true, as was said by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] the Government would not save this sum by retaining the present rate of postage on them, for the reports would be sent frequently as freight or by express instead of through the mail.

Some gentlemen may say, "Let not such documents be printed." Why, sir, the Committee on Appropriations in the legislative appropriation bill have recommended appropriations amounting in the aggregate to $235,000 for the support of the Agricultural Department for the next fiscal year; and yet gentlemen on this floor talk about not distributing the document which the Government issues as the report of that Department. I know that $65,000 of this proposed appropriation is for the distribution of seeds. Would gentlemen confine the operations of that Department so that it shall be merely a mammoth seed-store for the collection of foreign seeds and their distribution throughout the United States?

Mr. GARFIELD. Then, there is an appropriation of $52,000 for postage of that Department.

Mr. BURCHARD. Yes, sir; $52,000 is proposed to be appropriated for postage. That brings me directly to the point which I wish to suggest to the House. Who is most competent to select the individuals to whom these reports should be sent? Does the Commissioner of Agriculture know better than the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, for instance, who are the best farmers in a particular locality, and who will most appreciate the Report of the Department of Agriculture? And if the postage is to be paid, why should it be paid by the Commissioner as one of the expenses of his Department, rather than have the document issued by us stamped and directed by the respective members? I do not care particularly whether the name of the member is to be put upon the document. I would vote as quickly for the bill if that provision were left out; the point is immaterial. The principal question is, whether these documents shall be sent free through the mails?

I wish to call attention to the expenditures we are making for other bureaus. For geological explorations we appropriate $120,000, and publish only twelve thousand volumes of the report. At that rate the cost of each volume would be ten dollars, without estimating the cost of printing or the postage to be paid upon it. The expense of maintaining the Agricultural Bureau is, in round numbers, $240,000; and if you print only the usual copies of the Agricultural Report, which would furnish members of Congress and Bureau officers copies for their own use, without printing any for general circulation among the people, the number printed would be sixteen hundred and fifty volumes; which would make the cost at the rate of more than $100 a volume, supplying ourselves and a few favored persons with those reports, and the people none. I say, let us abolish the Agricultural Department if it is to be maintained to publish here at the public expense, merely for members of Congress and a few others, books that cost $100 apiece, just to collect the information, if sixteen hundred and fifty copies only are printed. I am for supplying the people also with the books and documents printed here. I am in favor of both provisions of this bill, and of the whole bill as it stands.

Mr. PACKER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN,] who wishes to have read an amendment and to make a few remarks upon it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will give us an opportunity to vote for the third section of the bill as a separate proposition, otherwise some of us will have to vote against the whole bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am indebted to the courtesy of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER] for the privilege of having an amendment read, which I hope the committee will allow to be voted upon, as I believe it will command the assent of the House.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In the third section of the bill insert before "county" the words "city or;" so that the clause will read "within the city or county where the same is published."

Mr. O'BRIEN. The propriety of this amendment is so obvious that it scarcely needs any explanation from me. Many large cities of the country are parts of counties; and some cities—for instance, the city of New York and the city of Philadelphia—comprise the whole of the county in which they lie. Other cities, however, are differently situated. Other cities—for instance, the city of Saint Louis, as I am informed, and as I know the city of Baltimore—are no part of the counties surrounding them. In view of this fact, the justice of this amendment is evident; because otherwise, while weekly newspapers would, under the bill, be allowed to circulate free in the county of their publication, a newspaper published in a city which is no portion of a county would have no privilege of free circulation. Hence I believe this amendment, if voted upon, would receive the unanimous assent of the House.

As to the general provisions of the measure now pending, I will say, as I said in the early part of this session when that chastening and purgative piece of legislation called the "salary bill" was before the House, I am in favor of a limited franking privilege, not only for the advantage of the people, but for the convenience of members of Congress. I am in favor of it because, if the documents published by order of Congress are to be circulated for the enlightenment of the people, it is the duty of Congress to provide some other means by which these documents shall be sent abroad over the country than at the expense of members. I am in favor not only of a franking privilege which will enable members to send documents to their different districts, far or near, but of a franking privilege which will accord an equal right to the people of the different districts, to the citizens of the different States, to communicate with the departments of the Government and with their representatives free of expense.

But, Mr. Speaker, why should not the publication of the public documents, which requires the expense of many hundred thousand dollars, be curtailed, as it is evident from the experience of every member that a large percentage of them reach persons who have little appreciation of their varied contents? It is necessary that the valuable information they contain should be published, but only in the number of books that will furnish the public institutions, libraries, &c., in the different districts of the States. Thus a vast expense would be saved, and the Post-Office Department be left unembarrassed by the distribution of tons of useless and unappreciated literature. There is, Mr. Speaker, a stronger reason against the wholesale publication and distribution of public documents than the item of expense. It is one which will commend itself to the reason and I hope approval of the House. I allude to the newspaper press, including the magazines and other journals, which circulate to the farthest bounds of civilization and interest and educate the pioneers on our far-west prairies whom public documents would never reach.

The newspaper is the daily and hourly medium of intelligence to the people, and its columns supply all necessary information on every subject interesting to the people, and when supplemented by the journals of agriculture, mechanics, the arts and sciences, affords an all-sufficient medium for the people to obtain the information usually contained in the Department reports.

The newspaper, Mr. Speaker, is the test of our country's greatness. Its prosperity is coeval with the advancement and progress of the people. Its success is the sure sign of the prosperity of the district and the intelligence of the people. Every branch of trade, every department of industry, advances or retrogrades just in proportion to the success or failure of the press. The fortunes of our people are inseparably blended with the struggle for life of the daily press, and therefore am I the advocate of the free circulation of the newspapers as provided in the bill before the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having indicated my objections to the vast expenditures required for the publication of the documents, I repeat my willingness to vote for any proper measure that will secure the free circulation of newspapers and enable the people to communicate without expense with their representatives and the several Departments of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, under ordinary circumstances I should not deem it necessary to say a word upon this bill, but content myself by expressing my opinion through the agency of my vote. I am, however, one of the committee reporting this bill, and therefore it is proper I should say a few words.

I am one of those who in the last Congress voted to repeal the franking privilege. I did so upon two considerations: first, in view of the figures which were presented by the Postmaster-General showing the apparently enormous cost of the privilege to the Government; and secondly, on account of the abuses with which the exercise of the privilege was attended. As the Postmaster-General's figures have not been verified, therefore I am now entirely relieved in that respect. Second, because of the then existing abuses of the franking privilege. I think we have cut them off effectively under the provisions of this bill. I would not vote for an unconditional re-enactment of the franking privilege for fear it might bring back the abuses of the past. I do not look upon this bill as any such re-enactment, but as a measure which has really for its object the distribution of documents published by Congress, be they few or many. And I believe it to be unjust to this bill to argue, as some members have done, that it will involve an enormous expense for public printing. The extent of the books to be published still rests with Congress. There are public documents, Mr. Speaker, which it is absolutely necessary should be printed for public information, and when they are printed we must have some such provision of law as is contained in this bill for their circulation.

If during the Forty-second Congress each member had been compelled to pay for the distribution of documents ordered to be printed, then every member would have had, for the two years of that Congress, to pay from his pocket and contribute of his own funds some $1,800.

It is a mistake to suppose the people of this country do not desire these documents and the information they contain. Let me give my own district as an illustration: From the commencement of the last session of the last Congress to the 1st of July last, when the franking privilege ceased, I distributed throughout my district about thirty-three hundred documents, for I had been somewhat dilatory in their distribution and they had accumulated on my hands. What became of these documents? I found on inquiry. Of this number only about one hundred were not delivered, mostly because of misdirection; even of these, although they did not at once find their place of destination, the larger part were eventually delivered by correction of address to the intended parties. In the city of Philadelphia, when public documents are sent through the mails, parties to whom they are sent are notified that the documents are awaiting them at the post-office. And of these thirty-three hundred distributed by me about thirty-two hundred of the number were sent on the parties being notified, and they then came to the post-office and got the documents themselves and took them home. It is, therefore, idle to tell me the people of this country do not desire these books, for they come to get them whenever they have an opportunity to do so. They do desire them, as the fact I have stated shows. There was but a single man, who came after his book after being notified, who refused to take it; and my judgment is he could not read, or he would not have done so. [Laughter.]

Some gentlemen on the other side of the House have said that this is a re-enactment of the franking privilege. In my judgment it is not a restoration of the franking privilege, as I have already stated. They say they are opposed to the restoration of the franking privilege, because by the last republican platform they were pledged to a repeal of the franking privilege. I have only to say to those gentlemen that I have watched republican platforms very closely since 1860, and there is not one which they did not tear down within twelve months after its erection. [Laughter.] So gentlemen on the other side need not stand on that point, for you ought at least by this time to have got used to this habit of the republican party. [Renewed laughter.] My time is out.

Mr. PACKER. I now yield for five minutes to my colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIERY.]

Mr. BIERY. Mr. Speaker, the third section of the bill now under consideration contains a provision which I had the honor to submit in a separate bill as early as December 8, 1873. I will send the bill to the Clerk's table, and ask to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to abolish the franking privilege," approved January 31, 1873, so as to allow the free transmission by mail of newspapers and periodicals, and bills and receipts for the same.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That said act be, and the same hereby is, so amended that the publishers of newspapers and periodicals may send to each other from their respective offices of publication, free of postage, one copy of each publication; that the publishers of weekly newspapers may send to each actual subscriber within the county where their papers are printed and published one copy thereof free of postage, and may also send to each actual subscriber herein specified, inclosed in their publications, bills and receipts for the same free of postage.

Mr. BIERY. Now, taking into consideration the large number of documents ordered to be printed by Congress at this session, it will not only be improper but entirely unjust to every member of this House to say they shall be distributed to our constituents who have elected us to these positions, at our own expense for postage. The Government has no more power to make a contract for me than any other man has the power to make a contract for me. It can no more bind me, in morals or in law, to send documents at my own expense than any other man can. And yet there is not a gentleman here but is willing to acknowledge that if those documents are not forwarded to the people I will be held responsible at their hands.

I am aware that a great many men here pay the postage on documents and send them home to their people. I am aware they spend their own money in that way; and since the decrease of salaries, I have no doubt many here feel it is a severe tax on their purses. They are not all wealthy men in this House; nor ought they to be. I hold that the poor man in this country ought to have an equal chance in the political as in every other department of life with the rich man. I maintain that the boy who goes through the thistles and the stones of early poverty, and cuts his own way upward, ought to have an equal standing everywhere with the man who is born with millions.

Now we hear it urged as a strong objection that it costs money to send these documents. A strange mania for what is called economy seems to have gone forth in this House. What is economy, Mr. Speaker? Is economy the hoarding of a few dollars of money? Go to the men who have risen through poverty to wealth, and ask them what economy is. Economy, sir, considered in the true sense of the word, is the proper disposition of available means; the proper investment of capital; whether you invest it in such a way that it brings in more dollars and cents, or whether you invest it in a way to enlighten your countrymen, or whether you invest it for charitable purposes. True economy, sir, as I have said, is not the hoarding of a few dollars, but is the proper disposition of means.

Now, what are we going to do? Are we going to pass an act to abolish the Agricultural Bureau? No. Are we going to abolish the Smithsonian Institution? No. Are we going to abolish the Statistical Bureau? No. These Bureaus will go on collecting valuable information, and men say here that this information is to lie dormant upon the desks of those who have these Bureaus in charge. Is that what we are going to do? I apprehend not.

Let us, in conjunction with these different Bureaus, forward the documents to the people to whom they belong. Let us do that under the safeguards that are provided in the bill that has been reported by the committee, and no man except those who are interested will have anything to say against it. I would say that if a safeguard could be thrown around an absolute frank, making its violation a penal offense, so much the better. But we have no power of that kind, and let us adopt the best safeguard we can. Let us, in addition to the stamp that is affixed by the Department on the documents, place on it our own signatures; and let the Government carry to the people what it has printed for the people.

Sir, it has been argued here that the great abuse of the franking privilege roused the whole country against it. How, sir, was the feeling of the country roused up? Has it not been explained here why it was that there were sent in the great bushel-baskets of petitions which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] placed around him until he was almost hidden by them? I was curious enough to examine some of those petitions. On looking at them I found they had a uniform printed heading. And something more. Why did not the great teacher from Iowa tell us that they were printed at the Government's expense on Government paper? Why did not the gentleman tell us that when he undertook to enlighten the class of young members of the House, to whom I myself belong—for, of course, I do not presume to know anything of what took place in the Forty-second Congress, because I was not here—why did the gentleman not tell the young members of the House that these petitions were franked to the people and franked back again? When I get a teacher I want to be taught the foundation of things. I do not want a superficial education on this floor or anywhere else. When men undertake to enlighten us—the young members of the House—I insist that they ought to enlighten us by telling us the whole truth.

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER,] has expired. The first question will be on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] that the bill and amendments be laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 140, not voting 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bromberg, Brown, Buffinton, Bundy, Burrows, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Williams, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Woodworth—140.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barry, Berry, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Dawes, Eden, Elliott, Benjamin W. Harris, John W. Hazelton, Hodges, Hooper, Hoskins, Hynes, Leach, Morey, Parsons, Pierce, Poland, Potter, Purman, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, William A. Smith, Snyder, Standeford, Stephens, St. John, Storm, Tremain, Waddell, and White—33.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. HOOPER. I desire to state that on this bill I am paired with my colleague, Mr. DAWES. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no;" he being opposed to the bill, and I in favor of it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Illinois. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. EDEN, has been called home on account of sickness in his family. If he were here he would vote "ay" on this question.

After the roll-call was concluded,

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, said: I did not get into the House until the roll-call was concluded; and therefore I am not entitled to vote.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined, and found truly enrolled, a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1759) for the relief of Henry S. Welles.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the same committee, reported that they had examined, and found truly enrolled, a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 437) to restore William Kilburn, of San Francisco, California, to the Navy of the United States as an ensign.

TRANSMISSION OF DOCUMENTS THROUGH THE MAILS, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the transmission of documents, &c., through the mails.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the amendment reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to the second section of the bill.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Is not the first question upon my amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] is in the nature of a substitute for the bill. The amendment reported by the committee is for the purpose of perfecting the bill.

Mr. POLAND. I think that this bill needs some further amendment than any that are now pending. I therefore move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, and Mr. POLAND were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 126, noes 51.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. TYNER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment reported by the committee to the second section of the bill.

The second section of the bill was as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States shall cause to be prepared, for their respective Houses, a special stamp, or stamped envelope or wrapper, of such form and design as shall be directed and approved by the Postmaster-General, to be used by the said Secretary and Clerk, or by such assistants as may be appointed by either of them, for their respective Houses, only upon such printed matter or documents, or packages of seeds, cuttings, roots, and scions as aforesaid, as the Vice-President, the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, may, by their respective written autograph signatures, indorsed upon the wrappers or envelopes thereof, direct to be so sent by mail as is provided in the foregoing section of this act.

The amendment reported from the committee was to add to the section the following:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, if the welfare of the service shall require, make rules and regulations delaying, in whole or in part, the transmission of documents and packages hereinbefore mentioned, for any period not exceeding thirty days from the time of delivery for mailing.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 3, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The next question was upon the amendment of Mr. HALE, of New York, as moved by Mr. HURLBUT, which was read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That the act entitled "An act to abolish the franking privilege," approved January 31, 1873, and also the proviso to section 3 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1874," approved March 3, 1873, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and from and after the passage of this act all acts or parts of acts which were repealed, annulled, or made of no effect by the said acts and parts of acts hereby repealed, or either of them, be, and the same are hereby, revived and continued in full force.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] if he has any objection to a division of the question, so that we may have a separate vote upon striking out, and afterward upon inserting?

Mr. RANDALL. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I object to debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have already been ordered by the House. The only way to get rid of them is to reconsider the vote ordering them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move to reconsider that vote.

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. HALE, of New York; and there were—yeas 50, nays 199, not voting 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Arthur, Averill, Barber, Bell, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Crutchfield, Eldredge, Farwell, Field, Freeman, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Hancock, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, Hays, Herndon, Hersey, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hynes, Kelley, Kendall, Lamar, Lofland, Maynard, McLean, Moore, Negley, James H. Platt, jr., Rapier, Rice, Robbins, Sener, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sloss, George L. Smith, Stowell, Strawbridge, Sypher, Vance, Wallace, Walls, and Wilshire—50.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Cotton, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Curtis, Danford, Alexander M. Davis, John J. Davis, DeWitt, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Fort, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Hunter, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hyde, Jewett, Kasson, Kellogg, Killinger, Knapp, Lamison, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Luttrell, Lynch, Magee, Marshall, Martin, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Mellish, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Monroe, Morrison, Myers, Neal, Niblack, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Randall, Ransier, Rawls, Ray, Read, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Sherwood, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Stone, Strait, Swann, Taylor, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Waddell, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodford, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—199.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ashe, Barry, Begole, Berry, Cain, Caldwell, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Crounse, Darrall, Dawes, Eden, Elliott, Benjamin W. Harris, John W. Hazelton, Hodges, Hooper, Lamport, Leach, Lewis, McJunkin, Morey, Nesmith, Parsons, Pelham, Potter, Purman, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, William A. Smith, Snyder, Standeford, Stephens, St. John, Storm, Thomas, Tremain, White, and Whiteley—41.

So the amendment of Mr. HALE, of New York, was not agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. If we cannot have a separate vote on any single section, I hope the bill will be laid on the table.

Mr. SENER. If the motion to lay on the table be voted down, Mr. Speaker, shall we not then come to a square vote on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The next question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SPEER. What does the House gain by the motion to lay on the table? Cannot the same thing be gained by a vote on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that a parliamentary question.

Mr. SPEER. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] to withdraw his motion, and let us take a direct vote on the bill. Thus we shall have one vote instead of two.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. MCKEE. I ask unanimous consent——

Several members objected.

Mr. MCKEE. I think gentlemen ought to know what they are objecting to. [Laughter.]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, Mr. WOODFORD, and others, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 129, nays 131, not voting 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Barber, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bowen, Bright, Buckner, Burchard, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark jr., Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Corwin, Crutchfield, Danford, Alexander M. Davis, John J. Davis, De Witt, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Durham, Eldredge, Field, Freeman, Giddings, Glover, Gunckel, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hereford, Herndon, Hersey, Houghton, Howe, Hunter, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamport, Lofland, Lowe, Magee, Marshall, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bradley, Bromberg, Brown, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Cook, Cotton, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Curtis, Darrall, Dobbins, Eames, Farwell, Fort, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Eugene Hale, John T. Harris, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hendee, E. Rockwood Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hyde, Jewett, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamison, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lowndes, Luttrell, Lynch, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Mellish, Merriam, Milliken, Mitchell, Monroe, Morrison, Niles, O'Neill, Orth, Packard, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Pendleton, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Poland, Pratt, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Sherwood, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Stone, Swann, Sypher, Tyner, Waddell, Waldron, Walls, Ward, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodford, and John D. Young—131.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barry, Cain, Clinton L. Cobb, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Dawes, Eden, Elliott, Benjamin W. Harris, John W. Hazelton, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hooper, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Morey, Parsons, Potter, Purman, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, William A. Smith, Snyder, Standeford, Stephens, St. John, Storm, Strawbridge, and Tremain—30.

So the House rejected the bill.

During the vote,

Mr. CLYMER stated that his colleague, Mr. STORM, who was unavoidably absent in Pennsylvania, would, if present, vote for the bill as a whole.

Mr. PIERCE stated that his colleague, Mr. HARRIS, who was absent on account of sickness, if present would vote in the negative.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Although not satisfied with all the provisions of the bill, still I will vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WOODFORD. I am requested by my colleague, Mr. TREMAIN, who is confined at his home by severe illness, to say if he were here he would vote against the bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I was prevented from voting by an accident; I am in favor of the bill.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. CESSNA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CESSNA. In order to save time I will withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. SENER. I renew it.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman vote on the prevailing side?

Mr. SENER. I did not; but I thought any member could make the motion to reconsider and lay upon the table.

The SPEAKER. Not unless a member votes on the prevailing side when there is a call by yeas and nays. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] made the motion to reconsider and lay upon the table almost simultaneously. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts also withdraw the motion to reconsider?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the motion, and call for the regular order of business.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Does it not require unanimous consent, after the motion is made, for a member to withdraw it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no such rule.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I demand the regular order of business.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE BY RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business has been demanded. The House by a suspension of the rules directed that on February 25, at the hour of half-past one, and on each and every day thereafter until disposed of, it would proceed to the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroads among the several States, reported from the Committee on Railways and Canals; and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY.]

Mr. RANDALL. I hope we will now take a recess.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman should go on without being antagonized by appropriation bills, would the Appropriation Committee lose any of its right on any other day?

The SPEAKER. Not at all. That would not affect it in any way. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] has charge of the bill reported from the Committee on Railways and Canals. The House directed it should be considered on the 25th of February and on each succeeding day, at the hour of half-past one o'clock, to the exclusion of all other orders except appropriation bills.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would not a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be in order?

The SPEAKER. It would not on any other than appropriation bills, because the order of the House making this the special order suspended that right.

Mr. MCCRARY. The committee have made some slight amendments in the text of the bill, and have instructed me to report an additional section. If the House prefers, instead of having the Clerk read the amendments, I will move that they be printed in the RECORD, so they will be before the members to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The bill, as amended, can be printed as a document by to-morrow's session.

Mr. MCCRARY. Then I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair gives notice that to-morrow, although this special order runs from day to day, yet, in accordance with the usage, he will recognize the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, to-morrow being private-bill day. If the House then negatives that motion, this bill will come up as the special order and hold its place.

Mr. MCCRARY. Before I yield to anybody I wish to enter a motion to recommit the bill.

SURVEY OF PALESTINE.

Mr. GUNCKEL, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 63) for the survey and exploration of Palestine on the east side of Jordan; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAY OF SCHOOL TEACHERS.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be directed to report forthwith a bill which shall compel the payment of the wages to the school teachers of the said District, who are now, as is alleged, many months in arrears.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I object, unless it is introduced for reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to say that this is a measure for removing the scandal of leaving unpaid, for many months, women dependent on their wages as school teachers, in the capital of this country. It is a scandal to the entire nation; and this merely orders that the committee shall bring in a bill to remedy that.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia objects to the consideration of the resolution now, and suggests its reference to his committee.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I give notice that on Monday I will offer the resolution under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the House take a recess until half-past seven o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening to resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873."

Mr. POLAND. My colleague, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] has some amendments to offer.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The first amendment I have to offer is to section 1135, page 262.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1135. The Quartermaster's Department of the Army shall consist of one Quartermaster-General, with the rank of brigadier-general; five assistant quartermasters-general, with the rank of colonel of cavalry; ten deputy quartermasters-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel of cavalry; fourteen quartermasters, with the rank of major of cavalry; thirty assistant quartermasters, with the rank of captain of cavalry; and such number of military store-keepers, not exceeding nine, as may be required, with the rank of captain of cavalry.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer the following amendment:

Add to the end of the section the words "nothing herein shall deprive of his office any person now holding the office of quartermaster with the rank of major."

In explanation of that amendment I will ask the Clerk to read the statute which I will send to the desk. It is the act of June 3, 1872, "to authorize the appointment of certain officers in the Quartermaster's Department." It is a little unusual in its form of expression, and I desire to have it read for the instruction of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be, and hereby is, authorized to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, certain officers of the Quartermaster's Department to the grade they would have held in said department, respectively, had the vacancies created therein by the act of July 28, 1866, from the rank of major to the rank of colonel, both inclusive, been filled by promotion by seniority: Provided, That no officer shall be deprived of his relative rank or reduced from his present grade by this act, and that the officers whose appointments are herein authorized shall take rank and receive pay only from the date of their confirmation.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It never occurred to the commissioners who revised the statutes, or to Mr. Durant, that that meant that the President should appoint two quartermasters with the rank of major. I never could have supposed so from the language myself, not being skilled in that kind of legal literature. But I inquired at the department of those who know what it means, and the committee have been able to ascertain that it provided for a temporary appointment of two quartermasters with the rank of major. The committee have directed me, therefore, to report this amendment. The amendment, as I have said, is founded on the act of June 3, 1872, which has been read; but the committee are of the opinion that this act was not designed to make a permanent increase of the number of quartermasters. It did not permanently change the act of 1866, which will be found in 14 Statutes at Large, page 334, section 13. The following letter from the Quartermaster-General will further explain this matter:

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 9, 1874.

SIR: I observe in the debate of the House of Representatives on the Revised Statutes, (page 40 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 5, 1874,) that you introduced an amendment to section 1135 whereby the number of officers in the Quartermaster's Department is fixed as follows:

One Quartermaster-General, with rank of brigadier-general; six assistant quartermasters-general, with rank of colonel; ten deputy quartermasters-general, with rank of lieutenant-colonel; twelve quartermasters, with rank of major; thirty assistant quartermasters, with rank of captain; sixteen military store-keepers, with rank of captain.

These are the numbers fixed by section 13 of the act of Congress approved July 28, 1866, (14 Statutes, 334, section 13,) and it is presumed that the amendment was made for the purpose of making the Revised Statutes agree with that act. But by the act of June 3, 1872, the number of quartermasters with rank of major was increased to fourteen, which number is now in the service and borne on the Army Register, (volume 17, page 214.)

It is suggested that the amendment be so modified as not to legislate out of the service the two majors who were added to the list by the act of June 3, 1872.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General U. S. A.

Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE,
House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment is to section 1158, page 265.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1158. Each company of engineer soldiers shall consist of ten sergeants, ten corporals, two musicians, and as many privates of the first class, not exceeding sixty-four, and as many privates of the second class, not exceeding sixty-four, as the President may direct.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer the following amendment:

Add to the section the following words: "And shall be recruited in the same manner, and with the same limitation, and shall be entitled to the same provisions, allowances, and benefits, in every respect, as are allowed to other troops constituting the present military peace establishment."

I ask that a letter from the Secretary of War relating to this matter be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, February 6, 1874.

SIR: I have noticed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 6, page 19, near the top, the proceedings with reference to the provisions of section 4, of the act of May 15, 1846, chapter 21 of the Statutes at Large, (9 Statutes, 12, 13,) which section is one of the provisions of the organic act creating the class of troops called engineer soldiers.

Let me briefly explain the object of this section.

First. By section 1154, page 265, [Durant's] Revised Statutes, the Battalion of Engineers is an integral part of the Corps of Engineers. (Commissioners' Revision, volume 1, page 596, section 57.)

Secondly. By section 1205, page 270, [Durant's] Revised Statutes, two great divisions of the Army, the line and the staff, are enumerated; the artillery, cavalry, and infantry alone constituting the line. (Commissioners' Revision, volume 1, page 605, section 112.)

Thirdly. By article 59, page 297, [Durant's] Revised Statutes, "if different corps of the Army come together to do duty the officer highest in rank of the line only will command the whole," &c.

Now the effect of the three laws just quoted would be, if the Battalion of Engineers came in service in conjunction with a squad of infantry, or of cavalry, or of artillery, commanded by a second lieutenant, to put this Engineer Battalion, officers, men, and all, under the command of this second lieutenant. It could not be avoided. The laws would give this second lieutenant the command.

Now section 4 of the act of May 15, 1846, chapter 21, (9 Statutes, 12, 13,) was enacted in the organic act creating these engineer soldiers for the very purpose of preventing such an event. It gives to this class of troops certain fundamental rights, places them on the same level with, and no higher than, other troops, and is required to preserve proper discipline in the various combinations which arise in the service.

The part of section 3 of the act of May 15, 1846, about the Articles of War, may be omitted, as covered by other provisions; but the portion beginning "shall be recruited in," &c., to the end of the section, should be embraced in the revised statutes, (at the end of section 1158.)

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE,
Committee on the Revision of the Laws,
House of Representatives.

Mr. LAWRENCE. From this letter it will be seen that the Secretary of War assumes that the act of May 15, 1846, 9 Statutes at Large, pages 12 and 13, section 4, modifies the original sixty-second Article of War, which is found in the act of April 10, 1806, 2 Statutes at Large, page 367. This article is put down as article 123, volume 1, of the Commissioners' Revision, page 666. I do not wish to be understood as agreeing with the construction which the Secretary of War has put upon these statutes, and I understand that the Committee on Revision of the Laws do not mean to stand committed to his construction. But the amendment is made merely to incorporate in the provision the words which are found in the existing statute. This leaves the question of their proper construction for the officers whose duty it is to carry them into effect.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment is to section 1208.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1208. When any lieutenant of the Corps of Engineers has served fourteen years' continuous service as lieutenant, he shall be promoted to the rank of captain, on passing the examination provided by the preceding section, but such promotion shall not authorize an appointment to fill any vacancy, when such appointment would increase the whole number of officers in the corps beyond the number fixed by law; nor shall any officer be promoted before officers of the same grade who rank him in his corps.

Mr. LAWRENCE. At a former session of the House an amendment was made to this section by inserting, after the words "Corps of Engineers," in the first line, the words "or of the Ordnance Department." I am instructed now by the committee to ask the unanimous consent to withdraw that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair that that amendment was made to section 1207.

Section 1207 was as follows:

SEC. 1207. No officer of the Corps of Engineers below the rank of field officer shall be promoted to a higher grade, until he shall have been examined and approved by a board of three engineers, senior to him in rank. If an engineer officer fail on such examination he shall be suspended from promotion for one year, when he shall be re-examined before a like board. In case of failure on such re-examination, he shall be dismissed from the service.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The amendment was intended to be made to section 1208. I am instructed to ask leave to withdraw it. Section 1208 is founded on section 9 of 10 Statutes at Large, page 219, and sections 3 and 4 of volume 12, page 743, of the Statutes, and is as reported by the commissioners in their revision. They refer to no repeal or modification. The amendment heretofore made is not correct. The act of March 3, 1869, (15 Statutes, page 318,) prohibiting new appointments and promotions in the several departments of the Army, was repealed, as to engineers, by the act of June 10, 1872, (17 Statutes, page 382.) But promotions in the Ordnance Department are not authorized.

There was no objection; and the amendment was withdrawn and stricken out.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment is to section 1461, page 313.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1461. Officers on the retired list shall be entitled to promotion as their several dates on the active list are promoted.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer the following amendment:

Add at the end of the section the following words:
No promotion shall be made to the grade of rear-admiral on the retired list while there shall be in that grade the full number allowed by law. There may be allowed upon the retired list nine rear-admirals and eighteen commodores.

This amendment is based on the act of 16th January, 1857, section 4, (11 Statutes at Large, page 154,) and the act of 2d March, 1867, (chapter 174, section 9, 14 Statutes at Large, page 517.) The provision of the act of 2d March, 1867, limiting the promotion to the grade of rear-admiral on the retired list to the number allowed by the law of 16th July, 1862, (12 Statutes at Large, chapter 183, section 14, pages 585 and 586,) does not appear to be included in either the commissioners' or in Durant's revision.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment is in section 1903.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1903. All that part of the territory of the United States included within the following limits, namely: Commencing at a point in the main channel of the Red River of the North, where the forty-ninth degree of north latitude crosses the same, thence up the main channel of the same, and along the boundary of the State of Minnesota to Big Stone Lake; thence along the boundary line of the State of Minnesota to the Iowa line; thence along the boundary line of the State of Iowa to the point of intersection between the Big Sioux and Missouri Rivers; thence up the Missouri River, and along the boundary line of the State of Nebraska, to the mouth of the Niobrara or Running Water River; thence following up the same, in the middle of the main channel thereof, to the mouth of the Keha Paha or Turtle Hill River; thence up that river to the forty-third parallel of north latitude; thence due west to the present boundary of the Territory of Washington; thence along the boundary line of Washington Territory to the forty-ninth degree of north latitude; thence east, along the forty-ninth degree of north latitude, to the place of beginning, is organized into a temporary government, by the name of the Territory of Dakota.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The amendment is to strike out, near the close of the section, the words "present boundary of the Territory of Washington; thence along the boundary line of Washington Territory," and insert in lieu these words, "twenty-seventh meridian of longitude west from Washington; thence due north on that meridian." That is the survey, as corrected at the Land Office.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to strike out section 1904, as the land described in that section is all included in sections 1908 and 1909, in relation to Wyoming and Montana Territories.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1904. Until Congress otherwise directs, all that part of the Territory of Idaho included within the following boundaries, to wit: Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the thirty-third degree of longitude west from Washington with the forty-first degree of north latitude; thence along the thirty-third degree of longitude to the crest of the Rocky Mountains; thence northward along the crest of the Rocky Mountains to its intersection with the forty-fourth degree and thirty minutes of north latitude; thence eastward, along the forty-fourth degree thirty minutes north latitude to the thirty-fourth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence northward, along the thirty-fourth degree of longitude, to its intersection with the forty-fifth degree north latitude; thence eastward, along the forty-fifth degree of north latitude, to its intersection with the twenty-seventh degree of longitude west from Washington; thence south, along the twenty-seventh degree of longitude, west from Washington, to the forty-first degree north latitude; thence west, along the forty-first degree of north latitude, to the place of beginning, is incorporated temporarily into and made part of the Territory of Dakota.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment is to section 1906.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1906. All that part of the territory of the United States included within the following limits, to wit: Beginning at a point in the middle channel of the Snake River, where the northern boundary of Oregon intersects the same; then follow down the channel of Snake River to a point opposite the mouth of the Kooskooskia or Clear Water River; thence due north to the forty-ninth parallel of latitude; thence east, along that parallel, to the twenty-seventh degree of longitude west of Washington; thence south, along that degree of longitude, to the northern boundary of Colorado Territory; thence west, along that boundary, to the thirty-third degree of longitude west of Washington; thence north, along that degree, to the forty-second parallel of latitude; thence west, along that parallel, to the eastern boundary of the State of Oregon; thence north, along that boundary, to the place of beginning, is created into a temporary government, by the name of the Territory of Idaho.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The amendment is to strike out the words "twenty-seventh degree of longitude west of Washington; then south along that degree of longitude to the northern boundary of Colorado Territory; thence west, along that boundary, to the thirty-third degree of longitude west of Washington; thence north, along that degree, to the forty-second parallel of latitude;" and insert in lieu thereof these words: "Thirty-ninth degree of longitude west of Washington; thence south, along that degree of longitude, to the west of the Bitter Root Mountains; thence southward, along the west of the Bitter Root Moutains, until its intersection with the Rocky Mountains; thence southward, along the crest of the Rocky Mountains, to the thirty-fourth degree of longitude west of Washington; thence south, along that degree of longitude, to the forty-second degree of north latitude."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman propose to use the word "degree" instead of "parallel" in relation to latitude?

Mr. LAWRENCE. That description comes from the Land Office, and has their approval. I do not hold myself responsible for its accuracy. The description of the boundaries of the Territories will not be found in any statute. The boundaries have been changed from time to time, and they can be ascertained only by surveys, or by making maps of them, which has been done at the Land Office. I call attention to the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in which he says these proposed amendments are correct.

The letter was as follows:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., February 24, 1874.

SIR: I return herewith penciled amendments in the descriptions of certain territorial boundaries, numbered 1, 2, and 3.

Upon examination, I find the amendments correct with the exception of the words "forty-first," on sheet number 2, which should read "forty-second," as amended in red ink.

Very respectfully,

WILLIS DRUMMOND,
Commissioner.

HON. W. LAWRENCE,
House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend by striking out section 1908.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1908. All that portion of Dakota Territory lying west of the one hundred and eleventh meridian of longitude, which, by an erroneous definition of the boundaries of that Territory by a former act of Congress, remains detached and distant from Dakota proper some two hundred miles, is hereby attached to the adjoining Territory of Montana.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment is in section 1907.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1907. All that part of the territory of the United States included within the following limits, to wit: Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the twenty-seventh degree of longitude west from Washington with the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; thence due west, on the forty-fifth degree of latitude, to a point formed by its intersection with the thirty-fourth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence due south, along the thirty-fourth degree of longitude, to its intersection with the forty-fourth degree and thirty minutes of north latitude; thence due west, along the forty-fourth degree and thirty minutes of north latitude, to a point formed by its intersection with the crest of the Rocky Mountains; thence following the crest of the Rocky Mountains northward till its intersection with the Bitter Root Mountains; thence northward, along the crest of the Bitter Root Mountains, to its intersection with the thirty-ninth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence along the thirty-ninth degree of longitude northward to the boundary-line of the British possessions; thence eastward, along that boundary line, to the twenty-seventh degree of longitude west from Washington; thence southward, along the twenty-seventh degree of longitude, to the place of beginning, is created into a temporary government by the name of the Territory of Montana.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The amendment is to strike out the words "to its intersection with the forty-fourth degree and thirty minutes of north latitude; thence due west, along the forty-fourth degree and thirty minutes of north latitude."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment is in section 2083.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2083. No person employed in the Office of Indian Affairs shall have any interest or concern in any trade with the Indians, except for, and on account of, the United States; and any person offending herein shall be liable to a penalty of $5,000, and shall be removed from his office.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The amendment is to strike out from the first line the words "the office of" before "Indian affairs;" so that it will read: "No person employed in Indian affairs shall have any interest," &c. The amendment is based on the act of 30th of June, 1834, (4 Statutes at Large, page 738, chapter 162, section 14.) Mr. Durant evidently supposed that that act described certain crimes as applicable to Indian affairs here in Washington. In the view of the committee the statute was designed to make certain acts penal, whenever they were committed by any person in the Indian service of the Government, whether at Washington or elsewhere. That is the object of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment is in section 2092.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2092. No annuities, or moneys, or goods, shall be paid or distributed to Indians while they are under the influence of any description of intoxicating liquor, nor while there are good and sufficient reasons leading the officers or agents, whose duty it may be to make such payments or distribution, to believe that there is any species of intoxicating liquor within convenient reach of the Indians, nor until the chiefs and head-men of the tribe shall have pledged themselves to use all their influence and to make all proper exertions to prevent the introduction and sale of such liquor in their country. And all executory contracts made and entered into by any Indian for the payment of money or goods shall be deemed and held to be null and void.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The amendment is to strike out the words, "and all executory contracts made and entered into by any Indian, for the payment of money or goods, shall be held and deemed to be null and void." The necessity of that amendment will be seen by reference to section 2108.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have an amendment to propose to section 3240.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3240. All persons required to make returns or lists of objects charged with an internal tax, shall declare therein whether the several rates and amounts are stated according to their values in legal-tender currency, or according to their values in coined money; and in case of neglect or refusal so to declare to the satisfaction of the collector receiving such returns or lists, such officer shall make returns or lists for such persons so neglecting or refusing, as in cases of persons neglecting or refusing to make the returns or lists required by law. And whenever the rates and amounts contained in the returns or lists are stated in coined money, the collector receiving the same shall reduce them to their equivalent in legal-tender currency, according to the value of such coined money in said currency for the time covered by such returns.

Mr. PENDLETON. The amendment is to insert at the end of the first sentence, after the words "required by law," these words: "and the collector shall assess the tax thereon, and add thereto the amount of penalties imposed by law in case of such neglect or refusal."

Mr. BECK. Should that be "collector" or "Commissioner?"

Mr. PENDLETON. We put it "collector," because we thought it did not refer in this case to "Commissioner."

Mr. BECK. The notes from the Commissioner's office say "Commissioner."

Mr. PENDLETON. I know the notes from the office say "Commissioner," but we thought it referred to the "collector." [After consulting with Mr. E. R. HOAR.] I am informed that under the act of 1872 the Commissioner is now the only assessing officer. I therefore modify my amendment by inserting "Commissioner" instead of "collector."

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. The Committee on Ways and Means, believing this to be a matter that they should look into, took occasion to appoint a sub-committee, composed of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] and myself, for that purpose. The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] as well as ourselves, went to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and had this matter pretty carefully revised. But, as I do not want to be unnecessarily interrupting the Committee on Revision in this work, I wish to ask the gentlemen having charge of it whether, when the various provisions relating to internal revenue shall have been passed over, there will still be an opportunity to go back and correct any errors that may have been overlooked, such as the one just suggested.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order was made some time ago in regard to this entire bill, that any member of the House should be entitled at any time to go back and suggest any amendment that he might claim had been overlooked.

Mr. BECK. I think it will be advisable to resubmit the work done here to the officers of the Internal Revenue Department; and hence I desire that there shall be an opportunity to go back for the correction of any errors that may be discovered.

Mr. POLAND. There has been an understanding from the beginning that as long as anybody could point out anything that was an error, there should be an opportunity to go back.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3243 by striking out all after the number of the section, being the following words:

The lists of taxes which accrue at other times shall be taken with reference to the times when they accrue, and shall be called monthly and special lists.

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

The lists or returns aforesaid shall, where not otherwise especially provided for, be taken with reference to the day fixed for that purpose by this title as aforesaid; and where duties accrue at other and different times the lists shall be taken with reference to the time when said taxes become due, and shall be denominated annual, monthly, and special lists and returns.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I wish to move an amendment to section 3244.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3244. Whenever it is ascertained that any list which has been or shall be delivered to any collector is imperfect or incomplete in consequence of the omission of the name of any person liable to tax, or in consequence of any omission, or understatement, or undervaluation, or false or fraudulent statement, contained in any return made by any person liable to tax, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, at any time within fifteen months from the time of the delivery of the list to the collector as aforesaid, enter on any monthly or special list the name of such person so omitted, together with the amount of tax for which he may have been or shall become liable, and also the name of any such person in respect to whose return, as aforesaid, there has been or shall be any omission, undervaluation, understatement, or false or fraudulent statement, together with the amount for which such person may be liable, above the amount for which he may have been or shall be assessed upon any return made as aforesaid; and he shall certify and return such list to the collector as required by law. And all provisions of law for the ascertainment of liability to any tax, or the assessment or collection thereof, shall be held to apply, so far as may be necessary, to the proceedings herein authorized and directed.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend this section by inserting after the number of the section and before the word "whenever," these words:

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and required to make the inquiries, determinations, and assessments of all taxes and penalties imposed by this title, or accruing under any former internal-revenue act, where such taxes have not been duly paid by stamp at the time and in the manner provided by law, and shall certify a list of such assessments, when made, to the proper collectors, respectively, who shall proceed to collect and account for the taxes and penalties so certified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3247 by inserting after the words "1 per cent. per month," in line 21, the words "as aforesaid;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3247. All returns required to be made monthly by any person liable to tax shall be made on or before the tenth day of each month, and the tax assessed or due thereon shall be returned by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to the collector on or before the last day of each month. All returns for which no provision is otherwise made shall be made on or before the tenth day of the month succeeding the time when the tax is due and liable to be assessed, and the tax thereon shall be returned as herein provided for monthly returns, and shall be due and payable on or before the last day of the month in which the assessment is so made. When the said tax is not paid on or before the last day of the month, as aforesaid, the collector shall add a penalty of 5 per cent., together with interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month, upon such tax from the time the same became due; but no interest for a fraction of a month shall be demanded: Provided, That notice of the time when such tax becomes due and payable is given in such manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. It shall then be the duty of the collector, in case of the non-payment of said tax on or before the last day of the month, as aforesaid, to demand payment thereof, with 5 per cent. added thereto, and interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month, as aforesaid, in the manner prescribed by law; and if said tax, penalty, and interest are not paid within ten days after such demand, it shall be lawful for the collector or his deputy to make distraint therefor, as provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3249 by inserting after the words "5 per cent. additional thereto," the words "and interest as aforesaid;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3249. If any person liable to pay any taxes neglects or refuses to pay the same within ten days after notice and demand, it shall be lawful for the collector or his deputy to collect the said taxes, with 5 per cent. additional thereto and interest as aforesaid, by distraint and sale, in the manner hereafter provided, of the goods, chattels, or effects, including stocks, securities, and evidences of debt, of the person delinquent as aforesaid: Provided, That there shall be exempt from distraint and sale, if belonging to the head of a family, the school-books and wearing apparel necessary for such family; also arms for personal use, one cow, two hogs, five sheep and the wool thereof, provided the aggregate market value of said sheep shall not exceed fifty dollars; the necessary food for such cow, hogs, and sheep, for a period not exceeding thirty days; fuel to an amount not greater in value than twenty-five dollars; provisions to an amount not greater than fifty dollars; household furniture kept for use to an amount not greater than $300; and the books, tools, or implements, of a trade or profession, to an amount not greater than $100, shall also be exempt; and the officer making the distraint shall summon three disinterested householders of the vicinity, who shall appraise and set apart to the owner the amount of property herein declared to be exempt.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3253 by inserting before the word "assess," in the last line, the words "the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall;" so that the section shall read as follows:

SEC. 3253. When property subject to tax, but upon which the tax has not been paid, is seized upon distraint and sold, the amount of said tax shall, after deducting the expenses of such sale, be first appropriated out of the proceeds thereof to the payment of the tax. And if no assessment of such tax has been made upon such property, the collector shall make a return thereof in the form required by law, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall assess the tax thereon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3254 by striking out the words "such charges," and inserting in lieu thereof "all lawful charges and fees;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3254. When any property advertised for sale under distraint, as aforesaid, is of a kind subject to tax, and the tax has not been paid, and the amount bid for such property is not equal to the amount of the tax, the collector may purchase the same in behalf of the United States for an amount not exceeding the said tax. All property so purchased may be sold by the collector, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The collector shall render to the Commissioner a distinct account of all charges incurred in such sales, and, in case of sale, shall pay into the Treasury the surplus, if any there be, after defraying all lawful charges and fees.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3257 by striking out in the first line the word "personal," so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3257. When any property liable to distraint for taxes is not divisible, so as to enable the collector by a sale of part thereof to raise the whole amount of the tax, with all costs, charges, and commissions, the whole of such property shall be sold, and the surplus of the proceeds of the sale, after satisfying the tax, costs, and charges, shall be paid to the person legally entitled to receive the same; or, if he cannot be found, or refuses to receive the same, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, to be there held for his use until he makes application therefor to the Secretary of the Treasury, who, upon such application and satisfactory proofs in support thereof, shall, by warrant on the Treasury, cause the same to be paid to the applicant.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3267 by striking out in the last line the word "in," and inserting "is;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3267. Whenever any property, personal or real, which is seized and sold by virtue of the foregoing provisions, is not sufficient to satisfy the claim of the United States for which distraint or seizure is made, the collector may, thereafter, and as often as the same may be necessary, proceed to seize and sell, in like manner, any other property liable to seizure of the person against whom such claim exists, until the amount due from him, together with all expenses, is fully paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3269 by inserting after the words "United States," in line 5, the words, "to enforce the lien of the United States for tax upon any real estate;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3269. In any case where there has been a refusal or neglect to pay any tax, and it has become necessary to seize and sell real estate to satisfy the same, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may direct a bill in chancery to be filed in a district or circuit court of the United States to enforce the lien of the United States for tax upon any real estate, to subject any real estate owned by the delinquent, or in which he has any right, title, or interest, to the payment of such tax. All persons having liens upon or claiming any interest in the real estate sought to be subjected as aforesaid, shall be made parties to such proceedings, and be brought into court as provided in other suits in chancery therein. And the said court shall, at the term next after the parties have been duly notified of the proceedings, unless otherwise ordered by the court, proceed to adjudicate all matters involved therein, and finally determine the merits of all claims to and liens upon the real estate in question, and, in all cases where a claim or interest of the United States therein is established, shall decree a sale of such real estate, by the proper officer of the court, and a distribution of the proceeds of such sale according to the findings of the court in respect to the interests of the parties and of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3270 by striking out in line 11 the word "became," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "has or may become;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3270. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have charge of all real estate which has been or shall be assigned, set off, or conveyed, by purchase or otherwise, to the United States, in payment of debts arising under the laws relating to internal revenue, and of all trusts created for the use of the United States, in payment of such debts due them; and, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may, at public vendue, and upon not less than twenty days' notice, sell and dispose of lands assigned or set off to the United States in payment of such debts, or vested in them by mortgage or other security, for the payment of such debts. And in cases where real estate has or may become the property of the United States by conveyance or otherwise, in payment of or as security for a debt arising under the laws relating to internal revenue, and such debt shall have been paid, together with the interest thereon, at the rate of 1 per cent. per month, to the United States, within two years from the date of the acquisition of such real estate, it shall be lawful for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to release by deed, or otherwise convey such real estate to the debtor, from whom it was taken, or to his heirs or other legal representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3271 by striking out in the fifteenth line, after the word "certified," the words "copy or;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3271. Whenever a collector has on any list duly returned to him the name of any person not within his collection district who is liable to tax, or of any person so liable who has, in the collection district in which he resides, no sufficient property subject to seizure or distraint, from which the money due for tax can be collected, such collector shall transmit a statement containing the name of the person liable to such tax, with the amount and nature thereof, duly certified under his hand, to the collector of any district to which said person shall have removed, or in which he shall have property, real or personal, liable to be seized and sold for tax. And the collector to whom the said certified statement is transmitted, shall proceed to collect the said tax in the same way as if the name of the person and objects of tax contained in the said certified statement were on any list of his own collection district; and he shall, upon receiving said certified statement as aforesaid, transmit his receipt for it to the collector sending the same to him.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3275 to strike out all after the word "for," in line 5, to the end of the section, as follows: "and all suits for taxes shall be brought in the name of the United States, and may be brought in any proper form of action or by any appropriate mode of proceeding," and to insert therefor these words:

Shall be brought in the name of the United States, in any proper form of action, or by any appropriate form of proceeding, qui tam or otherwise, before any circuit court or district court of the United States for the district within which said fine, penalty, or forfeiture, may have been incurred, or before any other court of competent jurisdiction; and taxes may be sued for and recovered in the name of the United States in any proper form of action, before any circuit or district court of the United States, for the district within which the liability to said tax is incurred, or where the party from whom said tax is due resides, at the time of the commencement of the said action.

So it will read:

SEC. 3275. It shall be the duty of the collectors, in their respective districts, subject to the provisions of this title, to prosecute for the recovery of any sums which may be forfeited by law. All suits for fines, penalties, and forfeitures, where not otherwise provided for, shall be brought in the name of the United States, in any proper form of action or by any appropriate form of proceeding, qui tam or otherwise, before any circuit court or district court of the United States for the district within which said fine, penalty, or forfeiture may have been incurred or before any other court of competent jurisdiction; and taxes may be sued for and recovered in the name of the United States in any proper form of action before any circuit or district court of the United States for the district within which the liability to said tax is incurred, or where the party from whom said tax is due resides, at the time of the commencement of the said action.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. To section 3276, which is as follows:

SEC. 3276. No suit for the recovery of taxes, or of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture, shall be commenced unless the Commissioner of Internal Revenue authorizes or sanctions the proceedings—

I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That in case of any suit for penalties or forfeitures, brought upon information received from any person other than collector or deputy collector, the United States shall not be subject to any costs of suit.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3283, in line 6, to insert after the word "warehouse" the words, "or bonded warehouse of the United States;" so it will read:

SEC. 3283. The Secretary of the Treasury, upon the production to him of satisfactory proof of the actual destruction by accidental fire or other casualty, and without any fraud, collusion, or negligence of the owner thereof, of any distilled spirits, while the same remained in the custody of any officer of internal revenue in any distillery warehouse or bonded warehouse of the United States, and before the tax thereon had been paid, may abate the amount of internal taxes accruing thereon, and may cancel any warehouse bond, or enter satisfaction thereon, in whole or in part, as the case may be. And if such taxes have been collected since the destruction of said spirits, the said Secretary shall refund the same to the owners thereof out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3291, line 10, after the word "such," to insert, "with his reasons therefor;" so it will read:

SEC. 3291. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the advice and consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, may compromise any civil or criminal case arising under the internal-revenue laws, instead of commencing suit thereon; and, with the advice and consent of the said Secretary and the recommendation of the Attorney-General, he may compromise any such case after a suit thereon has been commenced. Whenever a compromise is made in any case there shall be placed on file in the office of the Commissioner the opinion of the solicitor of internal revenue, or of the officer acting as such, with his reasons therefor, with a statement of the amount of tax assessed, the amount of additional tax or penalty imposed by law in consequence of the neglect or delinquency of the person against whom the tax is assessed, and the amount actually paid in accordance with the terms of the compromise.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3295, in line 3, after the word "residence," to insert the words, "trade or business;" so it will read:

SEC. 3295. Every person engaged in any trade or business on which a special tax is imposed by law shall register with the collector of the district his name or style, place of residence, trade or business, and the place where such trade or business is to be carried on. In case of a firm or company, the names of the several persons constituting the same, and their places of residence, shall be so registered.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3297, in line 3, to strike out the word "receipt," and in lieu thereof to insert the words "collector's register;" and in line 6, after the word "nor," to insert "except as hereinafter provided for;" so it will read:

SEC. 3297. The payment of the special tax imposed shall not exempt from an additional special tax the person carrying on a trade or business in any other place than that stated in the collector's register; but nothing herein contained shall require a special tax for the storage of goods, wares, or merchandise in other places than the place of business, nor, except as hereinafter provided for, for the sale, by manufacturers or producers, of their own goods, wares, and merchandise, at the place of production or manufacture, and at their principal office or place of business, provided no goods, wares, or merchandise shall be kept except as samples at said office or place of business.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3298, in line 3, after the word "time," to insert the words "except as hereinafter provided for;" so it will read:

SEC. 3298. Whenever more than one of the pursuits or occupations hereinafter described are carried on in the same place by the same person at the same time, except as hereinafter provided for, the tax shall be paid for each according to the rates severally prescribed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3300, in line 5, after the word "seventy," to strike out "six" and insert "five;" so it will read:

SEC. 3300. All special taxes imposed by law, including the tax on stills or worms, shall be paid by stamps denoting the tax, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is required to procure appropriate stamps for the payment of such taxes; and the provisions of sections 3375 and 3509, and all other provisions of law relating to the preparation and issue of stamps for distilled spirits, fermented liquors, tobacco, and cigars, shall, so far as applicable, extend to and include such stamps for special taxes; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have authority to make all needful regulations relative thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to strike out section 3303, which is as follows:

SEC. 3303. The receipt for the payment of any special tax shall set forth the trade or business for which it is paid, the name and residence of the person paying it, and the place where such trade or business is to be carried on. And every person carrying on any trade or business, for which a special tax is imposed, shall, on demand of any officer of internal revenue, exhibit the receipt for payment of the tax; and unless he shall do so, may be deemed not to have paid such tax.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 1304, in line 10, to strike out "tax receipt," and insert in lieu thereof the words "collector's register;" so it will read:

SEC. 3304. When any person who has paid the special tax for any trade or business dies, his wife or child, or executors or administrators or other legal representatives, may occupy the house or premises, and in like manner carry on, for the residue of the term for which the tax is paid, the same trade or business as the deceased before carried on, in the same house and upon the same premises, without the payment of any additional tax. And when any person removes from the house or premises for which any trade or business was taxed to any other place, he may carry on the trade or business specified in the collector's register at the place to which he removes without the payment of any additional tax: Provided, That all cases of death, change, or removal, as aforesaid, with the name of the successor to any person deceased, or of the person making such change or removal, shall be registered with the collector, under regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3305, line 8, before the word "rectification," to insert "distillation or;" and in line 20, after the word "brewer," to insert "or wholesale or retail dealer in malt liquors;" so it will read:

SEC. 3305. Every person who carries on the business of a rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, retail liquor dealer, or manufacturer of stills, without having paid the special tax as required by law, shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years. And all distilled spirits or wines, and all apparatus fit or intended to be used for the distillation or rectification of spirits or the compounding of liquors, owned by such person, wherever found, and all distilled spirits or wines and personal property found in the rectifying establishment, or in any building, room, yard, or inclosure connected therewith, and used with or constituting a part of the premises, shall be forfeited to the United States. Every person who carries on the business of a manufacturer of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, dealer in manufactured tobacco, dealer in leaf-tobacco, or retail dealer in leaf-tobacco, without having paid a special tax therefor, as provided by law, shall, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be fined not more than $500, or be imprisoned not more than one year, or both, at the discretion of the court. And every person who carries on the business of a brewer, or wholesale or retail dealer in malt liquors, without having paid a special tax therefor, as required by law, shall, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be fined not less than ten dollars nor more than $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3307, in line 30, to strike out the words "assess or;" and in line 33, after the word "who," to strike out the words "assesses or;" so it will read:

And provided further, That no officer shall collect any special tax for rectifying distilled spirits on any premises distant less than six hundred feet in a direct line from any distillery. And every officer who collects any special tax in violation of this section shall be liable to a penalty of $5,000 for each offense.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in line 59, same section, to strike out the words "at wholesale," and in lieu thereof to insert "in the original stamped packages;" so it will read:

Wholesale dealers in malt liquors shall pay fifty dollars. Every person who sells or offers for sale malt liquors in larger quantities than five gallons at one time, but who does not deal in spirituous liquors, shall be regarded as a wholesale dealer in malt liquors: Provided, That no brewer shall be required to pay a special tax as a wholesale dealer by reason of selling in the original stamp packages, whether at the place of manufacture or otherwise, malt liquors manufactured by him.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in line 134 to strike out the word "receipt," and insert in lieu thereof the word "stamp;" and in line 140 to strike out the words "assistant assessor of the division," and insert "collector of the district;" so it will read:

Tenth. Manufacturers of cigars shall each pay ten dollars. Every person whose business it is to make or manufacture cigars for himself, or who employs others to make or manufacture cigars, shall be regarded as a manufacturer of cigars. No special tax-stamp shall be issued to any manufacturer of cigars until he has given the bond required by law. Every person whose business it is to make cigars for others, either for pay, upon commission, on shares, or otherwise, from material furnished by others, shall be regarded as a cigar-maker. Every cigar-maker shall cause his name and residence to be registered, without previous demand, with the collector of the district in which such cigar-maker shall be employed; and every manufacturer of cigars employing any cigar-maker who shall have neglected or refused to make such registry shall be fined five dollars for each day that such cigar-maker so offending, by neglect or refusal to register, shall be employed by him.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to offer an amendment to section 2057.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2057. The President is authorized to appoint from time to time, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the following agents of Indian affairs: Five agents for the tribes in Oregon; three agents for the tribes in Washington Territory; three agents for the tribes in California; two agents for the tribes in Nevada; two agents for the tribes in Idaho; four agents for the tribes in Montana; ten agents for the tribes in Dakota Territory; one agent for the tribes in Wyoming Territory; one agent for the tribes in Utah Territory; six agents for the tribes in New Mexico; two agents for the tribes in Colorado Territory; six agents for the tribes in Nebraska; three agents for the tribes in Kansas; ten agents for the tribes in the Indian Territory; one agent for the tribes in Minnesota; one agent for the tribes in Iowa; two agents for the tribes in Wisconsin; one agent for the tribes in Michigan; one agent for the New York Indians; seven agents for the tribes in Arizona.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 451, section 2057, after the word "following," lines 2 and 3, insert "Indians."

Strike out all after the word "agents," in line 3, and insert:

Three for the tribes in Oregon; fourteen for the tribes east of the Rocky Mountains and north of New Mexico and Texas; seven for the tribes in New Mexico; three for the tribes in the Territory of Washington; one for the tribes in Kansas; one for the Kickapoos; one for the Delawares; two for the tribes in Utah; one for the Poncas; one for the Pawnees in Nebraska, each with an annual salary of $1,500. Four for the tribes in California, at an annual salary of $1,800 each; three for the tribes in Texas; one for the Wichitas and neighboring tribes west of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, at an annual salary of $1,000.

Mr. LAWRENCE. In the original or organic acts the expression "Indian agents" is used, and not the words "agents of Indian affairs," which occur in some later statutes. The number of Indian agents actually provided for by organic acts, excluding provisions occurring merely in appropriation acts, is forty-seven. No salary is mentioned in any act for the agent in Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment to section 4458:

Strike out the comma after the word "vessel," in line 2; also strike out the comma after the word "performed," in line 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next amendment is to section 4467.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4467. All coastwise sea-going vessels, and vessels navigating the great lakes, shall be subject to the navigation laws of the United States, when navigating within the jurisdiction thereof; and all vessels, propelled in whole or in part by steam, and navigating as aforesaid, shall be subject to all the rules and regulations established in pursuance of law for the government of steam-vessels in passing, as provided by this act; and every coastwise sea-going steam-vessel subject to the navigation laws of the United States, and to the rules and regulations aforesaid, not sailing under register, shall, when under way, except on the high seas, be under the control and direction of pilots licensed by the inspectors of steamboats.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the word "act," in line 7, and insert in place thereof the word "title."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

In section 4471, after the word "Washington," in line 3, insert "District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next amendment is to section 4479.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4479. Every pilot, engineer, mate, or master of any steam-vessel who neglects or willfully refuses to observe the regulations established in pursuance of the preceding section, shall be liable to a penalty of fifty dollars, and for all damages sustained by any passenger, in his person or baggage, by such neglect and refusal.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the word "and," in the fifth line, and insert in place thereof the word "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next amendment is to section 4480.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4480. There shall be, in each of the following collection districts, one inspector of hulls and one inspector of boilers; who shall be entitled to the following salaries:

In the districts of New York and New Orleans, to a salary of $2,200 a year each, &c.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

After the word "salaries," in the third line, add the following words: "to be paid annually under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next amendment is to section 4503.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4503. Every person who intentionally loads or obstructs, or causes to be loaded or obstructed, in any way or manner, the safety-valve of a boiler, or who employs any other means or device whereby the boiler may be subjected to a greater pressure than the amount allowed by the certificate of the inspectors, or who intentionally deranges or hinders the operation of any machinery or device employed to denote the state of the water or steam in any boiler, or to give warning of approaching danger, or who intentionally permits the water to fall below the prescribed low-water line of the boiler, and every person concerned therein, directly or indirectly, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined $200, and imprisoned not exceeding five years.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

Insert before the word "imprisoned," in the twelfth line, the following: "May also be."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. I move to amend by striking out section 4525.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4525. Every inspector who, upon any pretense, receives any fee or reward for his services rendered under this title, except what is herein allowed him, shall forfeit his office, and if found guilty, on indictment or otherwise, be punished, according to the aggravation of the offense, by fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

In section 4538 change the semicolon to a comma after the word "inch," in line 13.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next amendment is to section 4557.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4557. Every sea-going steamer, and every steamer navigating the great northern or northwestern lakes, carrying passengers, the building of which shall be completed after the passage of this title, shall have not less than three water-tight cross bulk-heads, such bulk-heads to reach to the main deck in single-decked vessels, otherwise to the deck next below the main deck; to be made of iron plates, sustained upon suitable frame-work; and to be properly secured to the hull of the vessel. The position of such bulk-heads and the strength of material of which the same shall be constructed shall be determined by the general rules of the board of supervising inspectors.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the words "passage of this title," at the end of the third, and commencement of the fourth line, and insert as follows: "28th day of August, 1871."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. My next amendment is to section 4575.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4575. The general duties of a shipping commissioner shall be:

First. To afford facilities for engaging seamen by keeping a register of their names and characters.

Second. To superintend their engagement and discharge, in manner prescribed by law.

Third. To provide means for securing the presence on board at the proper times of men who are so engaged.

Fourth. To facilitate the making of apprenticeships to the sea service.

Fifth. To arbitrate such questions, affecting seamen, as may be duly submitted to him.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out all of the fifth division after the word "to," in line 11, and insert in place thereof "perform such other duties relating to merchant seamen or merchant ships as are now or may hereafter be required by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. My next amendment is to section 4577.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4577. The master of every foreign-going vessel shall, before carrying any apprentice to sea from any place in the United States, cause such apprentice to appear before the shipping commissioner before whom the crew is engaged, and shall produce to him the indenture by which such apprentice is bound, and the assignment or assignments thereof, if any; and the name of the apprentice, with the date of the indenture and of the assignment or assignments thereof, if any, shall be entered on the agreement; and no assignment shall be made without the approval of a commissioner, of the apprentice, and of his parents or his guardian. For any violation of this section the master shall be liable to a penalty of not more than $100.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

Insert at the end of line 8, after the word "agreement," the following words: "which shall be in the form, as nearly as may be, given in the table marked A, in the schedule annexed to this title."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next amendment is to section 4578.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4578. The master of every vessel bound from a port in the United States to any foreign port other than vessels engaged in trade between the United States and the British North American possessions, or the West India Islands, or the republic of Mexico, or of any vessel of the burden of seventy-five tons or upward, bound from a port on the Atlantic to a port on the Pacific, or vice versa, shall, before he proceeds on such voyage, make an agreement, in writing or in print, with every seaman whom he carries to sea as one of the crew, in the manner hereinafter mentioned; and every such agreement shall be, as near as may be, in the form given in the table marked A, in the schedule annexed to this title, and shall be dated at the time of the first signature thereof, and shall be signed by the master before any seaman signs the same, and shall contain the following particulars, &c.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the proviso at the end of the eighth division of the section, in these words:

"Provided, That this section shall not apply to masters of vessels when engaged in trade between the United States and the British North American possessions, or the West India Islands, or the republic of Mexico."

That proviso is in the previous section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next amendment is to section 4590.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4590. All shipments of seamen made contrary to the provisions of any act of Congress shall be void; and any seaman so shipped may leave the service at any time, and demand the highest rate of wages paid to any seaman shipped for the voyage, or the sum agreed to be given him at his shipment.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

After the word "and," in the third line, strike out these words: "demand the highest rate of wages paid to any seaman shipped for the voyage," and insert in place thereof the following: "shall be entitled to recover the highest rate of wages of the port from which the seaman was shipped."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next amendment is to section 4610.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4610. Every shipping commissioner in the United States shall, within one week from the date of receiving any such money, wages, or effects of any deceased seaman or apprentice, pay, remit, or deliver to the circuit court of the district in which he resides, the money, wages, or effects, subject to such deductions as may be allowed by the circuit court for expenses incurred in respect to such money and effects; and should any commissioner fail to pay, remit, and deliver the same to the circuit court, within the time hereinbefore mentioned, he shall incur a penalty of not more than treble the value of such money and effects.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the word "district" in the fourth line, and insert in place thereof the word "circuit."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next amendment is in section 4646.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4646. Whenever distressed seamen of the United States are transported from foreign ports where there is no consul or officer of the United States, to ports of the United States, there shall be allowed to the master or owner of each vessel, in which they are transported, such reasonable compensation, in addition to the allowance now fixed by law, as shall be deemed equitable by the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. CASON. The amendment is to strike out the words "consul or" before the words "officer of the United States," and insert in lieu thereof the word "consular."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next amendment is in section 4679, in the schedule attached thereto. Before the table in relation to "scale of provisions," &c., insert a table in regard to "accounts of apprentices on board." That table has been dropped out in the revision, but it is in the original act, and the committee are of opinion that it should be inserted here.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. In the same section, in next to the last paragraph, I move to amend so that it will read "Table C" instead of "Table A."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next amendment is in section 4716.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4716. Fees of special counsel in prize-cases incurred or authorized by an Executive Department, or for the defense of captors against demands for damages made by claimants in the district court, not paid by claimants, nor from the prize-fund in the particular cause, and audited and allowed by the Department incurring or authorizing them, and by the Solicitor of the Treasury, shall be a charge upon, and paid out of, the funds appropriated for defraying the expenses of suits in which the United States is a party or interested.

Mr. CASON. I move to amend this section by striking out the words "an Executive" and inserting the word "any" before the word "Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. In section 4719, line 28, strike out the word "section" and insert "title."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I have some amendments to move to chapter 9, relating to drawbacks, or the return of duties. The provisions which have been revised by the commissioners were mainly the provisions of our early statutes, going back as far as the act of 1799, which provisions were in force before the adoption of the bonded-warehouse system, but which have been virtually repealed by the adoption of that system. The revisers, in a note, suggest whether these provisions have not become virtually repealed by the adoption of the warehouse system. We think that in point of law that doubt is a certainty; and therefore we recommend the striking out of a considerable of this chapter. Accordingly, I move to strike out sections 3050, 3051, 3052, 3063, 3068, 3072, 3073, 3076 to 3085, both inclusive, 3100 to 3108, both inclusive, and 3117 to 3120, both inclusive.

The sections above named were stricken out.

Mr. POLAND. I have an amendment to move to section 3060.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3060. No return of the duties shall be allowed on the export of any merchandise after it has been removed from the custody and control of the Government, except in the cases provided in sections 3050, 3054, 3055, 3057, and 3061.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out "3050;" that section has just been stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 3064.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3064. Where articles are imported in bulk they shall be exported in the packages, if any, in which they were landed; for which purpose the officer delivering the same shall return the packages they may be put into, if any, with their marks and numbers, and they shall not be entitled to drawback, unless exported in such packages, which shall be deemed the packages of original importation, nor unless they fully agree with the return made by the officer; and in respect to distilled spirits or wines the certificates issued by the inspector of the revenue for such spirits or wines shall be given up, and the drawback shall not be allowed on any such spirits or wines as do not agree, on examination, with the certificates so given up.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out the latter portion of the section commencing, "and in respect to distilled spirits or wines," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 3074.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3074. The collector shall direct the surveyor, where any, to inspect, or cause to be inspected, the merchandise so notified for exportation, and if it is found to correspond fully with the notice and proof concerning the same, the collector, together with the naval officer, if any, shall grant a permit for lading the same on board of the vessel named in such notice and entry. Such lading shall be performed under the superintendence of the officer by whom the same has been so inspected; and the exporters shall make oath that the merchandise, so noticed for exportation, and laden on board such vessel, previous to the clearance thereof, or within ten days after such clearance, is truly intended to be exported to the place whereof notice has been given, and is not intended to be relanded within the United States; otherwise the merchandise shall not be entitled to the benefit of drawback.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is in the first part of the section, to strike out "so," between the words "merchandise" and "notified."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND, The next amendment is to section 3075.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3075. All merchandise imported into the United States, the duties on which have been paid, or secured to be paid, may be transported by land, or partly by land and partly by water, or coastwise, from the district into which it was imported to two other districts, and exported from either of them with the benefit of drawback.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is to strike out the words "two other districts," and insert in lieu the words "any port of entry;" also strike out the words "either of them," and insert in lieu "such ports of entry."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 3093.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3093. The collector may refuse to grant such debenture, in case it shall appear to him that any error has arisen, or any fraud has been committed; and in case of such refusal, if the debenture claimed shall exceed $100, it shall be the duty of the collector to represent the case to the Comptroller of the Treasury, who shall determine whether such debenture shall be granted or not. In no case, moreover, of an exportation of goods shall a drawback be paid, until the duties on the importation thereof shall have been first received.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is to strike out "Comptroller," and insert "Secretary."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 3094.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3094. Before the receipt of any debenture, in case of exportation from the district of original importation, and in case of exportation from any other district before the receipt of any such certificate, as is hereinbefore required to be granted, the person applying for such debenture or certificate shall, previous to such receipt, and before the clearance of the vessel in which the merchandise was laden for exportation, or within ten days after such clearance, give bond, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the collector, who is to grant such debenture or certificate, as the case may be, in a sum equal to double the amount of the sum for which such debenture or certificate is granted, conditioned that such merchandise, or any part thereof, shall not be relanded in any port within the limits of the United States, and that the exporter shall produce, within the time herein limited, the proofs and certificates required of such merchandise having been delivered without such limits.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is to strike out near the middle of the section the words "or within ten days after such clearance."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 3098.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3098. In cases of loss by sea, or by capture or other unavoidable accident, or when, from the nature of the trade, the proofs and certificates before required are not, and cannot be, procured, the exporter shall be allowed to adduce to the collector of the port of exportation such other proofs as they may have, and as the nature of the case will admit; which proofs shall, with a statement of all the circumstances attending the transaction, within the knowledge of such collector, be transmitted to the First Comptroller of the Treasury, who shall have power to allow a further reasonable time for obtaining such proofs; or if he be satisfied with the truth and validity of the proofs adduced, to direct the bond of such exporter to be canceled. If the amount of such bond shall not exceed the penal sum of $200, the collector, with the naval officer, where there is one, and alone where there is none, may, pursuant to such rules as shall be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Treasury, admit such proof as may be adduced; and if they deem the same satisfactory, cancel such bond accordingly.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is to change the phrase "First Comptroller of the Treasury" to "Secretary of the Treasury;" also "Comptroller of the Treasury" to "Secretary of the Treasury."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 3113.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3113. Any merchandise imported from the British North American provinces adjoining the United States, which shall have been duly entered and the duties thereon paid or secured according to law at either of the ports of entry in the collection districts situated on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, may be transported by land or by water, or partly by land and partly by water, to any port or ports from which merchandise may be exported for benefit of drawback, and be thence exported with such privilege to any foreign country. The laws relating to the transportation of merchandise entitled to drawback from one district to another, or to two other districts, and the due exportation and proof of landing thereof, and all regulations which the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe for the security of the revenue, must, however, be complied with.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is near the close of the section, to strike out the words "from one district to another, or to two other districts."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 3121.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3121. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby further authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, as he may deem necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the five preceding sections, and to prevent the illegal reimportation of any merchandise which shall have been exported as herein provided.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is to strike out the words "five preceding sections," and to insert in lieu the words, "laws relating to drawbacks."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. That, Mr. Speaker, closes the amendments which we are prepared to offer to-night. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at nine o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

Also, the petition of the Pittsburgh Forge and Iron Company, and others, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which made a reduction of 10 per cent. in certain duties, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of David Laing and others, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of P. J. Murray and others, of Saint Louis, Missouri, of similar import, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ORR: Several petitions of citizens of Hardin and Story Counties, in the State of Iowa, for the establishment of a post-route, with tri-weekly mail service, from Eldora to Nevada, in said State, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. ORTH: The petition of Rev. Joseph C. Talbot, bishop of Indiana, for the establishment of a system of instruction in nautical science and the rudimental branches of English education in the United States Navy, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. RAWLS: The petition of David R. Dillon, of Savannah, Georgia, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SCUDDER, of New York: Several petitions of honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of Flushing, New York, for amendments to the homestead law, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. SPEER: The petition of David Etnier, and 80 other citizens of Brady Township, Huntingdon County, Pennsylvania, for the repeal of that part of the act of June 6, 1872, reducing the duties on certain articles, and remonstrating against imposing a duty on tea and coffee as oppressive to the people, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. THOMAS: The petition of the citizens of New Berne, North Carolina, for the removal of obstructions from the Neuse River, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of S. E. Koonce, of Jones County, North Carolina, for payment for services in carrying the United States mails, to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of citizens of Greene and Pitt Counties, North Carolina, for the establishment of a post-route from Snow Hill, via Willow Green and Ballard's Store, to Greeneville, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan: The petition of 504 citizens of Holland, Ottawa County, Michigan, for an appropriation of $50,000 for the improvement of Black Lake Harbor, Michigan, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WOODFORD: The petition of Snow & Burgess and others, merchants of the city of New York, that merchants associated under the name of mutual insurance companies, who have suffered by depredations of confederate cruisers, may be indemnified from the Geneva award fund, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a letter from E. E. Morgan's Sons, merchants of New York City, transmitting the foregoing petition, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 27, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of William Furness, praying that the proceeds of certain property confiscated by the so-called Confederate States, and afterward captured by the Army of the United States, and sold by order of the Secretary of War, be paid to him; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCOTT. I present the memorial of Jacob E. Weister and 103 other workingmen of the city of Philadelphia, protesting against any increase of taxation, and praying for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which made a reduction of 10 per cent. in certain duties on manufactured cottons, woolens, &c.; also, a similar petition from J. S. Bradley and 62 other citizens of Jewett, in the State of Illinois; a similar petition from C. H. Baker and 60 other citizens of Wyandotte, in the State of Michigan; and a memorial from A. L. Porter and 41 other citizens of Henderson County, Illinois, to the same purport. I move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT presented a memorial of the governors of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, asking for the payment to their States respectively of the amount of what is known as the 2 per cent. land fund, due them from the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of N. F. Hitchcock and other citizens of Junction City, Perry County, Ohio, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HAMLIN. I present the memorial of Moses Googins, who represents that his son, Andrew A. Googins, enlisted in the Army during the late war; that he was captured at the battle of the Wilderness, was incarcerated in a rebel prison, and there died. He, as the sole heir of his son, has been unable to prove definitely the death; and he therefore asks that such provision of law may be passed as will enable him to draw such sum as the son would be entitled to if he were alive. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I present the memorial of Thomas Belknap and 16 other citizens of Hartford, Connecticut, praying Congress to take into consideration and make provision for the payment of losses sustained by armed vessels of France prior to 1801, or to restore them to their claims and their remedy against France. I take this occasion to say that I hope the Committee on Foreign Relations will urge that bill forward at an early day, and that the Senate will take it up, so that justice may be done to these sufferers. I move that the memorial lie on the table, as the bill has been reported.

The motion was agreed to.

DUTIES ON FRUITS AND FRUIT-PLANTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2191) in relation to the customs duties on imported fruits, to report it back without amendment. The purpose of this bill is simply to correct or suspend for the time the trouble that has arisen growing out of the insertion of the comma after the word "fruit" in the law. The Senate is rather thin now. I should like to have the bill passed to-day, but I do not wish to put it on its passage when so few Senators are present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the Senator from Ohio had better withhold the report for the present, and make it subsequently.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I will withhold it for the present.

SIGNING OF WAR DEPARTMENT REQUISITIONS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1284) authorizing the chief clerk of the War Department to sign requisitions on the Treasury during the temporary absence of the Secretary of War, to report it back without amendment. The bill is strongly recommended by the Secretary of War, and its necessity is apparent; and I ask that it be put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill. It provides that when, from illness or other cause, the Secretary of War is temporarily absent from the War Department, he may authorize the chief clerk of the Department to sign requisitions upon the Treasury Department, and other papers requiring the signatures of the Secretary; the same, when signed by the chief clerk during such temporary absence, to be of the same force and effect as if signed by the Secretary of War himself.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to say that I shall not interpose any objection to this bill, as I appreciate the importance of disposing of it at once; but I give notice that I shall object to any interference with the morning business hereafter, so that we may get to the Calendar.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask consent of the Senate to make a very brief personal explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks consent to make a personal explanation. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I send to the Chair, and ask to have read, a very brief extract from a paper, called the Lebanon Courier, published at Lebanon, Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

But our other Senator, Hon. JOHN SCOTT, I am sorry to state, took sides with the contractionists, giving as a reason (if correctly reported) that he believed it to be the only means of bringing about a resumption of specie payment, and that it would tend to reduce wages so as to enable our manufacturers to compete successfully with those of foreign countries. This means, in plain English, exactly what Mr. KILLINGER says, to reduce our producing classes to a level with the pauper labor of Europe.

Mr. SCOTT. That article refers to a report, and says that I occupied a certain position, "if correctly reported." For the purpose of showing the origin of the report, I send to the Chair also an article, a very brief extract from which I have marked, contained in the Philadelphia Press of February 21, 1874, and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Senate Finance Committee and the contractionists and specie-resumptionists were badly beaten in the Senate to-day by the adoption of Mr. MERRIMON'S amendment, instructing the committee to report a bill increasing the national-bank circulation $46,000,000, making it $400,000,000 in all. The vote stood 28 to 25. Five Senators were absent and the remainder not voting were paired. Of the five absentees three are in favor of more currency and would have voted for the amendment, and two against it. This would still give the friends of more currency a majority of four or five. Senator SCOTT, who is a member of the Finance Committee, voted with the contractionists, while Senator CAMERON voted for the amendment. Senator SCOTT is in favor of resuming specie payments, and he thinks the way to do it is to keep down the volume of currency. His theory about specie payments is that, could this be reached, the rate of wages would be reduced, and we would then be in a better condition to compete with Europe.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, both these extracts reached me this morning in letters from numerous portions of the State of Pennsylvania, from those whom I consider my friends, and who advise me that, however averse my private feelings may be to a personal explanation, it is my duty to the State to correct whatever may be false in these extracts. The paper which is given as the original authority for the extract in the Lebanon Courier claims to be respectable. The Lebanon Courier, so far as I am aware of its character, is a respectable newspaper circulating in the interior of Pennsylvania. This announcement appeared originally in a newspaper claiming, as I have said, to be respectable, and the tone is such as to carry the idea that it speaks for me, and states my opinion and my theories by authority. It is again quoted and referred to in a paper in the interior of my State. So long as this has been confined to misrepresentation and fabrication chiefly of a personal character, I have declined to notice them. So repeatedly has this been the case that I can come to no other conclusion than that the reporter of the Philadelphia Press is under the orders of his superior systematically to misrepresent and defame me. When I have striven for and secured appropriations in which the city of Philadelphia was largely interested, I have been represented as neglecting her interests. When I advocated the expulsion of the Senator from Kansas, (Mr. Caldwell,) for reasons seeming to me to demand it, I was represented as defending him. When the books of the Secretary of the Senate showed that I had not drawn the back pay authorized by the law of the last Congress, his dispatches represented that I had drawn it.

I might refer to a more recent article in this same newspaper affecting a question in which Philadelphia and the State of Pennsylvania are largely interested, and in which it is complained that both the Senators from Pennsylvania have failed to force upon the Senate a measure which it was their duty to bring before it, or have been cowardly in advocating it. I forbear, however, to notice that, only referring to it that the Senate may bear witness as to whether either of the Senators from Pennsylvania has been derelict in his duty or cowardly in maintaining the interests of the State. Both of them, I trust, have too much respect for themselves and their associates to suppose that they could or would consent to force any bill upon the Senate.

When falsehoods are published as my opinions upon public questions, in which the people of my State are largely interested, as if uttered by me, my duty to them, they say, requires that I avail myself of the only means left me of meeting and refuting such an assumption. The reporter of the Philadelphia Press had no authority to write any such opinion or theory. I hold no intercourse with him.

I have not hesitated to announce my belief that specie payments could not be resumed in the near future, and could not be maintained under all circumstances. I favor free banking upon United States notes issued through the banks, based upon a bond bearing a lower rate of interest than those upon which the present national-bank currency is issued, and redeemable primarily by the banks, and ultimately by the Government, either in coin or in interest-bearing bonds. If I cannot secure that, I will favor the best system of free banking that can be secured by modifications of the present national-bank laws, incorporating among them some provision for the redemption of these notes.

To a paper currency unlimited in amount and irredeemable in anything more valuable than itself when it falls below par I am opposed, believing it to be injurious to the permanent and best interests of all classes of society; and these opinions I have not hesitated to express upon the floor of the Senate, although the condition of my throat, in consequence of a bronchial disease, has been such that I have refrained from speaking at length upon this and many other questions that I desired to have spoken upon. But upon this very subject, upon the very day on which this dispatch was sent from the city of Washington to the Philadelphia Press, in answer to a suggestion of my colleague, I said upon the floor of the Senate, and it is so reported in the RECORD:

Now, on the subject of specie payments, while I do not wish to be diverted for the purpose of discussing that question, my colleague equally misapprehends my position. I am not only not in favor of the immediate resumption of specie payments, but I do not think it possible for us to resume specie payments immediately, nor at any time in the very near future. He and I, I think, agree on that subject. I go further, and say that after we have resumed, it is not possible that we should keep up that resumption during all time, and especially during panics.

The closing inference of this dispatch, which is put as if it were my declaration, is that I favor this policy because I desire to reduce the wages of labor here to a level with that of the pauper labor of Europe. That is it in substance. Now, sir, if there be any Senator upon this floor who is open to the charge of advocating a policy which, instead of diminishing, will increase the wages of labor, I think I am open to that charge, and it can be sustained by numerous quotations from my speeches when the tariff and revenue bills have been under discussion, to none of which will I delay in referring here; but I condensed my whole opinions upon that question, in speaking upon that subject, into the declaration that I believed that the policy which I was then advocating would keep up the wages of labor, and that that policy would make labor contented and capital secure. I have never entertained or uttered such a sentiment about the wages of labor as that reported in the Press and quoted in the Courier. It is a fabrication and a falsehood.

Now, Mr. President, with the proprietor of the paper which first gave currency to this falsehood, or with the instrument he uses to furnish such materials for his columns, I can have no controversy. I have referred to instances of misrepresentation which have been, perhaps, intended to affect me both personally and in my public character, but not for the purpose of entering into any personal controversy. I depart, in this instance, from the rule of my life, to live down slander instead of noticing it, because my constituents have demanded it of me as a public duty. It is only in response to their demand that I rise for the purpose of saying to this constituency, who thus consider it my duty to notice this unauthorized fabrication of my opinions upon a public question, that neither my opinion upon public questions, nor my conduct in the Senate upon any question, is likely to be either correctly or fairly reported in the dispatches of a paper represented here, with the knowledge of its proprietor, by one who, when speaking of me, has been more frequently an eavesdropper and a libeler than an impartial journalist.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I think it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to a most gross and scandalous calumny against a fellow-Senator; and the reason I do it is because I am referred to as a witness. My attention has been called to the Detroit Free Press, a paper of great influence and of high standing, published at Detroit, Michigan, in which I find a special dispatch, dated Washington, February 20, which I will read:

CHANDLER AT HIS OLD TRICKS.—The Michigan delegation in the House is very savage against CHANDLER, who, they allege, has seized upon all the patronage in the State to further his interest as a candidate for re-election. The consequence is they are letting out a good deal of matter damaging to the Senator.

Now comes the point to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate:

Not a week ago Senator SHERMAN, of Ohio, had to take CHANDLER out of the Senate and put him to bed on a lounge in the room of the Finance Committee in a state of beastly intoxication. When CHANDLER woke up he grossly insulted Mr. Reese, the clerk of the Finance Committee.

Now, Mr. President, all I can say is that this is a total fabrication. I never took Mr. CHANDLER out of the Senate; I never put him to bed on a lounge in the room of the Finance Committee or anywhere else; I never saw him in a state of beastly intoxication; and Mr. Reese, who is the quiet, modest, industrious clerk of that committee, tells me the whole story, so far as his name is mentioned, is an utter fabrication. If this were a matter in regard to myself, I would not allude to it; but when I am referred to as a witness to prove so great a scandal against a fellow-Senator, I certainly must disclaim it, when I know it to be so utterly false.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Michael Fentenhime, claiming compensation for Morris Island, in the State of South Carolina, appropriated and used by the military forces of the United States, be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 65) to authorize the President to restore George Henry Preble, now a captain in the Navy, to his original position on the Navy Register, and promote him to the rank of commodore on the active list; and the bill (S. No. 31) for the relief of Captain Louis C. Sartori, of the Navy; and the memorial of Commander R. F. R. Lewis, United States Navy, praying restoration to his original position on the Navy list, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed, and the bills were postponed indefinitely, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print a communication of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate, information touching the Chippewa tribe of Indians, reported in favor of the motion; and it was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies," reported it with amendments.

DUTIES ON FRUITS AND FRUIT-PLANTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now make the report of the bill in regard to fruits to which I referred. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2191) in relation to the customs duties on imported fruits, to report it back with an amendment; and I should like to have the bill passed now, as the Senate must see the importance of it. It is to correct the error that has been commented upon in both Houses in regard to the punctuation of a law that affects the revenue of the country daily. We report one amendment to the bill.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the repayment of all duties heretofore paid on imported fruits until further legislation by Congress authorizing the same, or until the final decision of the Supreme Court.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was to add to the bill the following words:

Except in cases where suits in court have been discontinued by instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the error in the punctuation of the clause relating to fruit-plants, in the first section of the act approved June 6, 1872, entitled "An act to reduce duties on imports and to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," of inserting a comma instead of a hyphen after the word "fruit" is hereby corrected; and said clause shall read as follows: "Fruit-plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SAN FRANCISCO MINT.

Mr. SARGENT. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2201) to render available a certain unexpended balance of appropriation, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration. It is to make available a certain unexpended balance appropriated for the construction of the branch mint at San Francisco.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which reappropriates and makes available the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the construction of the United States branch-mint building at San Francisco, California, now remaining on the books of the Treasury Department to the credit of the appropriation for that work, and unavailable under the provisions of the fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of the act of July 12, 1870.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GREEN BAY AND STURGEON BAY SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. OGLESBY. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 447) extending the time for the completion of the Green Bay and Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal, in the State of Wisconsin, to report it back without amendment. The bill is a mere extension of time, which the House has passed, and the Committee on Public Lands have all agreed to it and recommend its passage. It will only take a moment, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. WRIGHT. I gave notice when the first bill was called up this morning that I should object to all bills being considered this morning. Some have been considered. Now, if there is no debate upon this bill, I shall not object to the vote being taken at once.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which extends the time for the completion of the Green Bay and Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal to the 10th day of April, 1876.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I give notice now that I shall object to all other bills being considered.

THOMAS HILLHOUSE.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to report back, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 253) for the relief of Thomas Hillhouse, assistant treasurer of the United States in New York City, and to ask for its present consideration. A report accompanies the bill, which may be read if desired. Probably it had better be printed.

The report was ordered to be printed.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which proposes to direct the proper accounting officers to allow Thomas Hillhouse, assistant treasurer of the United States at New York City, in the settlement of his internal-revenue stamp account, a credit for the sum of $185,000, being the proceeds of sale of internal-revenue stamps embezzled by James I. Johnson, a clerk in his office, without the default or negligence of the assistant treasurer.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CUSTODIANS OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to report the following resolution, and I ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate what, if any, additional legislation is required to prevent defalcation by officials receiving and disposing of United States revenue stamps and public moneys, and whether the persons having actual custody of such stamps and moneys should not in all cases be required to give bond, with security, for the proper execution of their duty.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FENTON. I am requested by General Paine, of this city, to ask that the bill which I now submit, without previous notice, may be received.

No objection being made, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 545) to incorporate the Oxygen Gas Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. FENTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 546) establishing certain post-roads; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 547) for the relief of Clarissa Bishop, of New Orleans, Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to take up the resolution for the printing of the Smithsonian report. I think it will detain the Senate but a moment. It was up the other morning.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted on the 13th instant by Mr. HAMLIN, and which the Committee on Printing proposed to amend so as to make it read:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That seven thousand five hundred additional copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1873 be printed, five hundred of which shall be for the use of the Senate, one thousand for the use of the House, and six thousand for the use of the Institution: Provided, That the aggregate number of pages of said report shall not exceed four hundred and fifty, and that there shall be no illustrations except those furnished by the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. HAMLIN. My colleague interposed some objection to the resolution because there were five hundred copies provided for in it for the Senate and a thousand for the House. I have conferred with my colleague, and I have also conferred with the Senator who reported the resolution, and with their concurrence I move now to strike out the whole number appropriated to both the Senate and House. That will be my first motion. I shall follow that with another motion to increase the number to the Smithsonian Institution by fifteen hundred, which is just the number stricken out. That takes away entirely the objection to printing any copies for our own distribution. I transfer that number to the Institution for this reason: I take it every Senator, like myself, has supplied the principal libraries of his State for years with this work. They will want it and they will cease to call upon us, but they will call upon the Institution for it, and that number which was proposed for the Senate and for the House will be transferred there, and there they will find them.

I want to say also, in this connection, that by an exchange of this very work with foreign societies and foreign governments, we add to our Congressional Library works of value, amounting to between two and three thousand volumes annually.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as proposed to be amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. If amended as proposed by the Senator from Maine, the resolution will read:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That seven thousand five hundred additional copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1873 be printed for the use of the Institution: Provided, That the aggregate number of pages of said report shall not exceed four hundred and fifty, and that there shall be no illustrations except those furnished by the Smithsonian Institution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the Secretary will report the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON. I rise to ask the President of the Senate whether the centennial bill does not now come up in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not until one o'clock, unless by a vote of the Senate. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, to the amendment of the Committee on Finance, in section 2, line 8, to strike out the words "the amount necessary," and insert "for this purpose the sum of $10,000."

Mr. THURMAN. I wish the attention of the Senator from Maine for a moment. That amendment will not limit the expenditure to $10,000. It only limits the present appropriation to $10,000. The preceding part of the bill contains a distinct enactment that all the expenses shall be paid. I suggest, therefore, to the Senator from Maine, that if he wants to limit the expense to $10,000 he must move an amendment in the preceding part of the bill. His amendment can be acted upon and adopted, and then another amendment can be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. THURMAN. Let that amendment be adopted, and then insert in line 4, after the word "expenses," the words "not exceeding $10,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. Now I move to insert after the word "investigation," in line 5, the words "not exceeding $10,000."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That will do.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] gave notice of an amendment to be offered at the proper time. It will now be in order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The amendment, I will state, comes from some agent who is interested for the brewers of the country, who pay a very large tax, and it has been submitted to a number of the members of the committee, and I believe they think it perfects and does not injure the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is in line 11 of the first section of the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, to insert after the word "alcoholic" the words "and fermented;" and after the word "traffic," in the same line, to insert "distinguishing as far as possible, in the conclusions they arrive at, between the effects produced by the use of distilled or spirituous, as distinguished from the use of fermented and malt liquors;" so as to read:

It shall be their duty to investigate the alcoholic and fermented liquor traffic, distinguishing as far as possible, in the conclusions they arrive at, between the effects produced by the use of distilled or spirituous, as distinguished from the use of fermented or malt liquors, in its economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects, &c.

Mr. THURMAN. It is not my purpose to make a speech on this bill, but I cannot help saying that, in my judgment, this commission, if appointed, will be productive of no earthly good. I have presented petitions asking for the appointment of such a commission, and I am as much opposed to intemperance as any man can possibly be, and yet I do believe that the result of this commission, if it be appointed, will not add one particle to the light that we already have upon the subject-matter to be investigated.

In the first place, let us see who will compose this commission. There is something a little curious about that. The bill is that there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission of five persons, neither of whom shall be the holder of any office of profit or trust in the General or a State government. What is the reason of that exclusion? I really do not know, and am totally at a loss to conceive. Why it is that a person holding an office under the Federal or a State government is not qualified to inquire into the results of the traffic in ardent spirits, or in malt or vinous liquor, is past my comprehension. But that prohibition perhaps is to prevent a multiplicity of offices. The usual objection to a multiplicity of offices is that that doubles salaries; but here no salary is to be paid, so that I am totally at a loss to know why it is that all the officers down to a justice of the peace in the States, and all the officers of the Federal Government, however competent they might otherwise be, are to be excluded from this commission.

That is the first thing. Then comes: "The said commissioners shall be selected solely with reference to personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation, and shall hold office until their duties shall be accomplished, but not to exceed one year." And then the second section provides that they "shall serve without salary," and their jurisdiction extends over the entire territory of the United States; their inquiries may be anywhere and everywhere, employing a secretary at a compensation of $2,000 a year. Provision is made for the payment of their necessary expenses, but the commissioners themselves are to serve without any salary. Now, Mr. President, do we not know what kind of commissioners will be appointed? What five gentlemen are there who will be found to serve on this commission, and perform all this duty which is required of them, except those whose convictions of the evils of the traffic in spirits are so great that they are willing to devote their time and their means to this investigation, or who will be supported or receive some compensation while thus devoting their time to it from some of the various temperance organizations of the country?

Why, Mr. President, you might just as well put in this bill at once that the officers of the national temperance societies shall constitute this commission; for nobody but some very ardent temperance man, some one who believes that legislation ought to be provided perhaps of the most stringent kind in reference to this traffic will serve on this uncompensated commission, and incur all the labor and all the expenditure of time that will be required to do what this bill contemplates shall be done—that is, to make an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation. Therefore, I say that we shall get not one particle of light that we have not already, for the very same gentlemen who will compose this commission are the men who for years have been with great industry laying before their countrymen the evils that result from the traffic in intoxicating liquors, and they can do nothing more than compile their old reports or gather here and there some other information upon the subject, not new in its character at all, not in the slightest degree different from that which has already been laid before the country.

That being the case, as there is nothing in this bill that will bring before us one single fact, one single thought, one single suggestion which is not already familiar to everybody who has looked into this subject, the sole object of this bill must be by presenting here in Congress, through a commission created by Congress, statistics on this subject, to invoke the interference of the General Government in a matter which heretofore has been considered by all parties to belong to the several States so far as the States themselves were concerned within the territory of the States, and not to the General Government.

Of course we might legislate in respect to these matters in the Territories and in the District of Columbia, and we might, properly enough, or lawfully enough, or constitutionally enough, gather information upon the subject, in order to enable us to legislate in the Territories or in the District of Columbia; but is there a man on this floor who needs any of this information in order to tell him what laws it would be well to pass on this subject, if any, either in the District of Columbia or in the Territories of the United States? I venture to say not one; and therefore, although I repeat there is no man who deplores intemperance more than I do, there is no man who is, according to the best of his judgment, a better friend of temperance than I am, yet I do not like this bill, which is nothing but an entering-wedge to legislation by Congress which Congress ought not to indulge in at all, and which belongs to the several States; a bill to provide for a commission, the result of whose inquiries, I venture to say, and to say it with a good deal of confidence, will shed not one ray of light on this question that has not been shed before.

Mr. President, people have become intoxicated as far back as history teaches us. The first signal event after the flood was that the great man who was saved from the wrath of the Almighty planted a vineyard and unfortunately got drunk; and from that time to this men have suffered from the evils of intemperance; and it requires no commission in the middle of the nineteenth century, or the last quarter of the nineteenth century, to tell the American people, or any people, what are the deplorable evils that result from the excessive use of ardent spirits. No, sir; it cannot be for the purpose of acquiring knowledge that this commission is asked for. It is for the purpose of laying a foundation for Congress to assume a jurisdiction that belongs to the States, and that cannot be exercised by Congress without a violation of the rights of the States, and without, in my humble judgment, detriment to the very cause which these petitioners have so ardently and sincerely at heart.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, when this bill was before the Senate on a former occasion I suggested that I should be unable to vote for it, upon the sole ground that the object of its introduction here was to lay the foundation of legislation by Congress in reference to the liquor traffic in the States. I expressed no opinion whatever upon the propriety of prohibitory legislation by the States themselves within their own jurisdiction. The only opinion that I expressed was that such legislation by Congress would be a violation of the Constitution, and that this bill was an entering-wedge in that direction; and for saying that, a prohibitory convention in my own State has since decorated me with its censure; the fact alone demonstrating that what I said was true, that the object of the introduction of the bill was to lay the foundation of legislation which I believe every Senator on this floor will agree would be unconstitutional.

Now, sir, under such circumstances, however I might feel as to the expediency of prohibitory legislation by the States themselves, I could not, consistently with my well-known views upon the subject of extending the power of the Federal Government over the States and State internal police beyond its constitutional functions, assent to the passage of such a bill as this. The bill is founded upon petitions which ask for this investigation, expressly, as they say, for the purpose of laying the foundation of such legislation, and the bill after the information has been gathered as to the effect of prohibitory legislation in the several States, requires the commissioners to report the results of their investigation to the President for the purpose of being transmitted to Congress.

Now, sir, I do sympathize with these petitioners. I do not think that any man with a clear intellect and with a heart in his bosom can consider the sweeping flood of intemperance that is pouring over this land, carrying devastation and ruin before it everywhere, without wishing that some method could be devised which would be sufficient to stay its desolating course; but at the same time to attempt to accomplish even this most beneficent result by methods destructive of the fundamental principles of our federative system, to lay that system, or help to lay that system, in ruins, in times like these, is something which I cannot bring myself to do. All the efforts which have been made since the close of the war to extend the legislative jurisdiction of Congress have been begun by commissions of inquiry in relation to matters always supposed to belong properly to the States, until within the last few years; and, believing that all we enjoy under this blessed Government of ours is at last owing to our federative system, which protects the citizen primarily by the exercise of the functions of local self-government by the States, I am unwilling to do anything which shall assist the tendency of the present time to increase Federal jurisdiction at the expense of the proper functions of the States. Now, as before, I express no opinion whatever upon the expediency of State laws prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors for the purpose of suppressing intemperance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the bill known as the centennial bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I appeal to the Senator from Pennsylvania to let us take a vote on this bill and get it out of the way, unless some Senator is disposed to debate it further. I should like to do so myself, but I will waive it and ask for a vote.

Mr. CAMERON. If a vote can be taken without debate I will not interfere with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the pending order will be laid aside informally.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not desire to debate this bill, but to propose a single verbal amendment. On line 11, of section 1, I move to strike out "alcoholic," and insert "manufacture;" so as to read:

> It shall be their duty to investigate the manufacture of, and traffic in, ardent spirits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment now pending of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] which the Secretary will report.

The CHIEF CLERK. The pending amendment to the first section is to insert the words "and fermented," after the word "alcoholic;" so as to read, "to investigate the alcoholic and fermented liquor traffic," &c.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection to that. Let that be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on this amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is another branch of the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey still pending, to insert after the word "traffic" the words, "distinguishing as far as possible, in the conclusions they arrive at, between the effects produced by the use of distilled or spirituous, as distinguished from the use of fermented or malt liquors."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I now move to strike out "alcoholic" and to insert "manufacture."

Mr. WRIGHT. Let me suggest to the Senator from Maine whether he will not reach his object if he says "alcoholic liquor traffic and manufacture."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That will be the same thing. That language is preferable. I move that amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a still further amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey; which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is at the end of the first section of the committee's amendment, to insert:

> And the effect produced by such legislation upon the consumption of distilled or spirituous liquors and of fermented or malt liquors.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to amend by inserting in line 11 of the first section of the committee's amendment, after the words "traffic and manufacture," the words, "having especial reference to revenue and taxation."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I move further to amend by inserting at the end of the first section of the committee's amendment as amended the following:

> And also ascertain whether the evil of drunkenness has been decreased or increased thereby; whether the use of opium as a stimulant and substitute for alcoholic drinks has become more general in consequence of such legislation; and whether public morals have been improved or hypocrisy and dissembling encouraged thereby. It shall also be the duty of said commissioners to gather information and take testimony as to whether the evil of drunkenness exists to the same extent or more so in other civilized countries, and whether those foreign nations that are considered the most temperate in the use of stimulants are so through prohibitory laws, and also to what degree prohibitory legislation has afected the consumption and manufacture of malt and spirituous liquors in this country.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust that it will be voted down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware to the amendment.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. BAYARD. Before the question is decided, I should like to ask whether it is now plainly proposed to examine one side of this question, and not all. If it is intended to procure statistics to be of any value, to be of any authority, the commissioners must tell the whole truth. A half truth has been well said to be worse than a whole lie. Now if you have statistics in regard to any question prepared, so as to state the facts only with reference to one side of that question, you will have a half truth, which will be worse than a whole falsehood. Why should gentlemen object to the entire truth on a question so important as this? There is no man in this Chamber who believes it to be more important than I do; there is no man who can be more interested on this question than I am; but when we have light shed on it, why shut out any light from any quarter, or from any state of facts? Do gentlemen who favor the bill fear the result of the answer to such inquiries as I have named? Are they of the belief that abstinence from alcoholic stimulus forms the sole virtue of the world? Are they disposed to shut out the fair balance of facts in regard to a subject so important as this?

I stated yesterday my reasons for opposing this whole commission, upon no less ground than was well stated by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY,] who addressed the Senate a few minutes since, that if the commission, and if this measure, does not absolutely propose legislation of Congress on this subject, it looks to it, and it can have no other pretext than subsequent action by Congress when these statistics shall have been returned to us. If we are to have any information, let us have it all, and not have it one-sided to suit the views of one class of people, and those who consider but one side of the subject.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The proposition is, as I understand it, to inquire how far certain legislation has encouraged hypocrisy and dissembling, and to have a report as to that fact made to this body. It seems to me that if there is anything outside of the jurisdiction of this body, it is the very inquiry here proposed. I do not know why you should not make inquiry whether the creation of an office, and the appointment of an officer to fill that office, is not a cause of dissembling. I do not believe that is the kind of logic that should be employed here. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust we shall have a vote now, Mr. President.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will again be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. BAYARD.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that he strike out that clause which seems to impugn the motives of those who have charge of this movement, by insinuating that they are guilty of hypocrisy, &c. It seems to me that language is rather offensive.

Mr. BAYARD. If Senators really consider that that is a rebuke of any kind, when it is a simple inquiry whether certain legislation has caused it or not, be it so. In my own belief, I will frankly say that all this coercion in regard to individual tastes and habits does lead to secrecy and to a secret performance of those things which are not wrong per se. But I am disposed to yield to the wishes of Senators, for I desire to make my amendment practicable. I am willing to strike out the words objected to if doing so will carry the rest of the amendment. If we are to have this inquisition, if we are to have this commission, I desire simply that the report shall be as full as possible, and shall not be one-sided or relate simply to one class of facts. I am a disbeliever entirely in this system of coercive legislation. The experience of my life has made me so. I believe that the more open, the more candid, the more above-board a man and a people can be, the better chance is there for you to rectify their errors and their mistakes. I think if men can but be encouraged to an open avowal of their views, if there can be but candid statements by a man to his fellows, there is a chance to reconcile disagreement, and there is a chance to bring about reform in many matters.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I have been looking at the amendment, and I suggest to him that dropping four words, or perhaps five, will not change the substance or sense at all.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator refers to the words about dissimulation and hypocrisy.

Mr. CONKLING. I do.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection to striking them out.

Mr. CONKLING. They can be dropped without materially affecting the sense.

Mr. BAYARD. I have indicated my willingness to drop them out.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to say but a word in regard to this matter. I am in favor of the broadest possible inquiry; and I see no objection to the whole of the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, except that clause which seems to impute improper motives to those who have supported this honest effort to prevent the acknowledged evils of intemperance. I will vote for any amendment which will broaden this investigation and make it fair, and one that people can rely on. I hope with that modification the amendment will be adopted and this bill gotten out of the way.

Mr. SCOTT. This bill came from a committee of which I am a member, and of course it would be my duty to endeavor to have it passed. I desire to have it passed; but it is evident that the expectation of the Senator from Iowa to pass it without discussion this morning cannot be successful; and if there is any further debate on it, I shall call for the regular order.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think we are just on the point of disposing of the bill, if the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow it to be done.

Mr. SCOTT. If there can be an immediate vote, I do not object; but if there is to be any further discussion, I shall call for the regular order.

Mr. THURMAN. I want one minute.

Mr. SCOTT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. THURMAN. When I say a "minute," I mean a minute.

Mr. SCOTT. It will provoke somebody else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania calls for the regular order, which is the centennial bill.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEST submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2213) granting a pension to Mrs. Cynthia McPherson, mother of the late General James B. McPherson;

A bill (H. R. No. 2208) authorizing the President to reinstate George M. Book on the active list of the Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 2209) granting a pension to Louisa H. Canby, widow of the late General E. R. S. Canby;

A bill (H. R. No. 2212) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret S. Meade, widow of Major-General George G. Meade;

A bill (H. R. No. 64) restoring the pension of Frances C. Elliott, widow of Commodore Jesse D. Elliott, late of the United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 519) to grant an American register to the Canadian tug Noah P. Sprague; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2206) to grant an American register to the bark Azor.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1394) in relation to the centennial exhibition.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CAMERON and Mr. SUMNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMERON. I give way to the Senator from Massachusetts. I understand he is prepared with a speech.

Mr. SUMNER. No.

Mr. CAMERON. I always like to listen to him, and I will see what he has to say before I say anything in defense of the measure.

Mr. SUMNER. I send to the Chair an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be inserted will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence should be national in character, so as fitly to commemorate the beginning of the American Republic; and that its further conduct should be left in the hands of the commissioners appointed under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, subject to the condition expressly set forth in such act, "that the United States shall not be liable for any expense attending such exhibition or by reason of the same."

Mr. SUMNER. I am often struck by the vicissitudes of business and debate in this Chamber. For weeks the Senate has been engaged in considering the financial condition of the country, where, amidst great divergence of opinion, all have been anxious to help the Treasury. And now, leaving this subject unfinished, a bill is interjected, whose practical object is to commit Congress to a scheme which will cost millions of money. I cannot err when I say millions. This will appear in the brief explanation which I now make.

Certain gentlemen in Philadelphia, to whom I refer with respect, conceived some time ago the idea of commemorating in that city the hundredth anniversary of American Independence. The idea was excellent, and the place selected was peculiarly proper; for in Philadelphia sat the Continental Congress which put forth the great Declaration.

Too much cannot be said in favor of this commemoration. The 4th of July, 1776, in Philadelphia, witnessed not only the beginning of the American Republic, but also the beginning of Republican Institutions on earth. Down to that date no Republic had existed founded on the two distinctive principles announced by our fathers, that all men are equal in rights, and that just government stands only on the consent of the governed; nor had any such Republic been described by historian or philosopher. Greece and Rome, Venice and Genoa, were Republics in name only. How feeble the speculations of Sidney and of Montesquieu by the side of the precise definition first enunciated by our fathers! Pardon me for calling attention to this contrast. I do it, because I would not fail to impress upon you the peculiar grandeur of the anniversary, marking, I repeat, not only the beginning of the American Republic, but of Republican Institutions on earth; marking one of the greatest epochs of human history.

In this statement I do not exaggerate. Only a slight acquaintance with the times shows that the day was so regarded by many contemporaries, whose liberal spirit enabled them to discern historical events in the light of reason. Of these I select John Adams, whose remarkable words, early and late, show more than those of any other person the magnitude of the occasion. Jefferson, who stated the great principles so well, was a less prophetic spirit. Who does not thrill at the words of John Adams, written at the time:

Yesterday the greatest question was decided which ever was debated in America, and a greater, perhaps, never was nor will be decided among men. * * * I am surprised at the suddenness as well as greatness of this revolution. * * * It is the will of Heaven that the two countries should be sundered forever.

Then, as the toil and blood and treasure it will cost to maintain the Declaration rise before him, the prophet exclaims:

Yet through all the gloom, I can see the ray of ravishing light and glory, and that posterity will triumph in that day's transaction.

In harmony with this inspired declaration was John Adams to the end. In 1780 he foretold the spread of the English language so that it would be the language of the world, under impulse from America; and in 1787 he foretold that our thirteen governments were "destined to spread over the northern part of that whole quarter of the globe," being North America. At the same time he let drop other words, showing how the future of the Republic filled his soul:

A prospect into futurity in America is like contemplating the heavens through the telescope of Herschel. Objects stupendous in their magnitudes and motions strike us from all quarters and fill us with amazement.—Defense of American Constitution Works, vol. 6, p. 218.

In the same spirit the same prophet wrote to Thomas Jefferson, November 15, 1813:

Many hundred years must roll away before we shall be corrupted. Our pure, virtuous, public-spirited, federative Republic, will last forever, govern the globe, and introduce the perfection of man.—Jefferson's Complete Works, vol. 6, p. 258.

And yet, again, when life was still more advanced, and he wore the crown of years, he wrote to H. Niles, February 13, 1818:

The American Revolution was not a common event. Its effects and consequences have already been awful over a great part of the globe. And when and where are they to cease?—Works, vol. 10, p. 282.

The effects awful, and when and where are they to cease? In such words this great prophet testified to the day we are about to celebrate.

I adduce these utterances to show how completely and severely national is the anniversary; how it grows out of the opening prologue of our history; how, therefore, it should be kept in constant subjection to the genius of that day. Such, I am persuaded, was the original idea; such, I am sure, was the idea of the Senate when it adopted the first bill on this subject. Attention has been called to the language of that bill, inasmuch as it uses the term "international," as well as "national." But it is impossible to read that bill carefully without seeing that its ruling idea was the celebration of the hundredth birthday of the American Republic, and the beginning of its great example. So far as the "international" element is introduced, it is only as an incident to the great principal. So little was this regarded at the time—so entirely was it absorbed in the national character of the celebration—that it made little or no impression, while Congress expressly guarded against any expense on account of the exhibition. And in fulfillment of this idea the commissioners have already voted that the exhibition shall begin on the 19th of April, the anniversary of Lexington, and close on the 19th of October, the anniversary of Yorktown—thus by metes and bounds of time marking ostentatiously the national character of the occasion.

To show how plain this is in the statute, please consider its precise language. And here I begin with the preamble. In early days of parliamentary history the preamble played a great part. Some preambles are eloquent morsels of history and style, and I am disposed to place this among them. It begins:

Whereas the Declaration of Independence of the United States of America was prepared, signed, and promulgated in the year 1776, in the city of Philadelphia.

This statement doubtless was to secure the celebration for Philadelphia. It then proceeds:

And whereas it behooves the people of the United States to celebrate, by appropriate ceremonies, the centennial anniversary of this memorable and decisive event, which constituted the 4th day of July, 1776, the birthday of the nation.

It will be observed how distinctly we are reminded of the birthday of the nation to be celebrated by appropriate ceremonies—all of which is national, and not international. Then follows:

And whereas it is deemed fitting that the completion of the first century of our national existence shall be commemorated by an exhibition of the natural resources of the country and their development, and of its progress in those arts which benefit mankind, in comparison with those of older nations.

Here you will see how the products of older nations are treated as a mere incident to the exhibition, which is essentially national. The preamble then proceeds:

And whereas no place is so appropriate for such an exhibition as the city in which occurred the event it is designed to commemorate.

Thus again referring to Philadelphia as the proper place to commemorate the great day. And then the preamble closes:

And whereas, as the exhibition should be a national celebration, in which the people of the whole country should participate, it should have the sanction of the Congress of the United States.

Such is the preamble, being the key to the statute. Nothing here of an international exhibition. Nothing here of a World's Fair. Now, I insist that a World's Fair is something so well known in character, besides so large, so grandiose, so magnificent, that it is not to be inferred out of vague and uncertain language. It must be specifically named and described.

The purpose of Congress is still further apparent in the express conditions of section 7:

That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States; and the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition or by reason of the same.

Language could not be stronger to relieve the United States of all liability, and to throw it absolutely upon the commissioners under the act. I remember well the passage of this bill, and I know what was intended, for I drew these words myself. They were meant to be notice to all concerned that the United States would assume no pecuniary responsibility in the premises.

Such was the beginning of this business. But after awhile the commemoration of American Independence and the national birthday, which so filled the soul of the elder Adams, was not enough for our commissioners, and they undertook to supplement the national celebration by a World's Fair. To my mind one of these is enough for any commission. The two together are too much. They are more than any commission ought to undertake. But this is a mild statement. The two are essentially separate and distinct in character, being inharmonious, inconsistent, and incongruous. The two do not go together naturally, and yet they are to be put together. They will be no better than twins bound together by an unnatural ligament, so as to be a constant burden to each other—of which those now on the table of the surgeons in Philadelphia are the unhappy prototype—each stunting and dwarfing the other. One is essentially national and domestic; the other international and cosmopolitan. One is for the American people; the other for all people. One is to exalt Republican Institutions and advance their predestined sway; the other is to court and win the monarchies of the Old World to appear at our great banquet, and to swell its pomp.

I see now the stately procession as it files into the historic Hall at the opening ceremonies. There is England, the workshop and counting-house of the world, to whom we are bound by two great ties of relationship, blood and commerce; her Queen appears on the anniversary of Lexington, and taking a seat on the penitential benches, listens to the great Declaration, while it arraigns her grandfather, George III, as "a prince whose character is marked by every act which may define a tyrant;" and there the Queen sits until the anniversary of Yorktown. France is there also, the original ally by whose blood and treasure Independence was assured, who witnessed in her own fearful Revolution the first-fruits of ours, and at her head is a military President, a believer in monarchy, who does not willingly listen to the praise of Republican government. I see Spain also, not to be forgotten as an ally of our fathers, tardily lending her fleets, with a manly, generous people, and at her head is another military President, with no love for the Republic. I am glad to recognize Italy, the home of art and the land of history, making her forever interesting; and this ancient new-born nation appears by two sovereigns, Victor Emanuel, her King, believing in kings, and the Pope, Pius IX, who never fails to give his prayers and sympathies to kings. There also is Germany, whose commanding position in the civilized world is assured by her pen, mightier even than her sword, and whose children are our fellow-citizens; and this great Power appears by her Emperor, who believes in the "right divine," and in token thereof, at his coronation as Prussian King, allowed no hand but his own to place the crown upon his sacred head. Austria is by the side of Germany, with ancient prejudices dissolving in the sunlight of modern improvement, and with a Hungarian rebel as Prime Minister, and this nation, still great, though shorn of former proportions, appears by her Emperor, the representative in blood and place of his progenitor Joseph II, who, declining to meet Franklin, said, "My business is to be a royalist." There also are Belgium, Holland, Denmark, and Sweden, each with a King. And there also is Russia, our traditional ally, whose growing civilization is illustrated by a great act of Emancipation and Enfranchisement always to shine in the history of the human family, and this wide-spread Empire appears by her Czar. Behind are Turkey and Egypt, each like the lion in Paradise "pawing to get free its hinder parts"—one appearing by the Ottoman Sultan, and the other by its Khedive rejoicing in his wealth and in his new-found title of unrepublican sovereignty.

All these take their places on the 19th of April, not to move till the 19th of October. Such at least is the programme; such is the idea of the pending bill. Just in proportion as they fail to appear, will there be disappointment if not loss. If not in person, then by plenipotentiary will they all appear; but the plenipotentiary, while on this service, is the sovereign. But will they appear? Should we invite them to appear?

I may err; but to my mind it is plain that the proposed combination is a mistake which, if persisted in, must end in detriment to the anniversary and to the World's Fair. If one gains the other must suffer. Now, I do not mean to say that the people will not come from foreign lands. I believe they will, and with them artists and artisans or their works.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator says he does not say these artists and artisans will not come. Has he any idea that they will come unless their governments accept the invitation; and what is the prospect of other governments accepting the invitation, seeing that the invitation was given eight months ago and but one great power, to wit, Germany, has so far accepted?

Mr. RAMSEY. At this point, with the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts, I will send to the desk a dispatch which I have just received this morning, announcing the acceptance by Sweden of the invitation.

Mr. THURMAN. Sweden is not one of the great powers, though a highly respectable one.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to state——

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator will pardon me, I would rather proceed.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope the Senator will allow that dispatch to be read.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STOCKHOLM, February 27, 1874.

To Senator RAMSEY, Washington:

Diet enthusiastically passed Philadelphia exhibitor appropriation. Reference in the discussion to your motion.

ANDREWS.

Mr. SUMNER. That does not shed much light on the question. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President——

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator allow me to go on?

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly; if the Senator will not allow me a word at this point.

Mr. SUMNER. I would rather proceed.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well.

Mr. SUMNER. Sweden is a power for which I have great respect, and her ruler I know to be enlightened, while her most distinguished citizen is one with whom I had the good fortune to form relations of friendship here in Washington which will last as long as life. I therefore cannot refer to Sweden except with respect and honor. But Sweden does not lead the European household; Sweden does not sit at the head of the feast. All her present respectability, all the memories of Gustavus Adolphus and Gustavus Vasa, are in vain to place her now in any commanding attitude. But does Sweden know the terms of this proceeding? Does she know the twin character of the day, that we are to celebrate the beginning of Republican Institutions, while at the same time we proclaim a World's Fair?

When interrupted I was remarking that I did not doubt that many artists and artisans would come; and I was about to add that they will not move in full force except under the quickening influences of European governments, inspired by kindly sympathy. All this will be especially needed to counteract the impediments of distance, and also the smaller temptation to exhibitors from the comparative smallness of population. At the World's Fair of London, Paris, and Vienna, all Europe, with a population of two hundred and seventy-five millions, was present by daily visitors and witnesses, so that what was exhibited became known at once throughout that immense people. Here was a sphere by the side of which our forty millions must seem small. This difficulty can be overcome on our part only by superior effort and corresponding outlay of money. Are we ready for such outlay? This outlay is enforced also by the examples of other nations, who have lavished large sums on the structures built for the occasion. Among the fine arts architecture is one of the most beautiful, as it is the most comprehensive, embracing all other arts, especially design-painting, sculpture. Who does not see that a structure like this Capitol is a picture in stone—that it is poetry in stone? But the edifice to receive the art treasures of the world must be a monument kindred in character.

There is another impediment, which is in the nature of a warning. The proposed fair will come only three years after that of Vienna. This is too soon for such an effort. A longer interval is needed, that there may be a new and full crop of inventions, of productions, and of works of art. A World's Fair is not an annual plant, flowering with the rose and the apple-tree. It requires time for its beautiful and variegated flower. Its stem must be large, healthy, and well nourished by years.

I am sorry to be obliged to say these things. I wish it were otherwise, for I have much respect and kindness for the gentlemen now engaged in this business. But I find myself admonished by a resolution which has passed the Massachusetts senate, although it has failed in the other house. I will read it:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of Massachusetts in General Court assembled, That, in view of the important part which Massachusetts performed in the events to be commemorated, both by the wisdom of her statesmen and the bravery of her soldiers; in view of the intimate relations established in our early history between Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, our Senators and Representatives in Congress be and are requested to give their support to all reasonable congressional appropriations which may be required to carry on the proposed centennial exposition—

I am sorry the English word "exhibition" was not used—in such manner as to make it a complete representation of the various industries of the nation, and a worthy tribute to those great men who secured for us the inestimable blessings of a free republic.

In the conclusion of the senate of Massachusetts, I concur. They say nothing in favor of a World's Fair, while they rejoice in the proposed commemoration of the national birthday. Pardon me if I add to this authority the testimony of a private citizen, in a letter to myself, who has given much attention to this subject:

The centennial celebration of 1876 should be first and foremost, and I think it scarcely too much to say only, a grateful vindication of 1776.

It should be severely and grandly simple; not ostentatious or boastful.

It should be inexpensive for a thousand obvious reasons; but, above all, because it does not become a nation any more than an individual on the verge of bankruptcy to be extravagant, especially at the moment when the attention of the world is invited to the study and imitation of her methods of management.

It should be national and not provincial. It should be so conducted that all and not a few only can participate in it.

It should not involve the displacement of large masses of people, which is perilous to the health, expensive, and more or less demoralizing.

It should be free from every feature calculated to sectionalize or divide the country, and be so managed as to secure the greatest possible harmony and unanimity. It should be as educating and elevating in its influences as possible, both in this and foreign countries.

All these results may be secured by proper instrumentalities. I think none of them will be if the Philadelphia scheme is encouraged by the Federal Government any further. Of the international part of it, the converting it into a European fair, with an American corner for Yankee notions, I will not trust myself to speak.

To all these considerations I add yet another. A World's Fair is essentially governmental in character. Such it has been in other countries, and such, I fear, it must be in ours. The Government invites, the Government is host; the Government, therefore, must guide and shape its conduct, and must pay the expenses, as if it were the Army or Navy. Undertaking this service, it must determine where the fair shall be held—in which of the two capitals of the Union—Washington, the political capital, or New York, the commercial capital. It must at once take charge of the enterprise, leaving to our Philadelphia friends the commemoration of the great day and its marvelous fruits.

But there is something easier and more practical. It is to bring the Philadelphia enterprise at once in subordination to the original idea—to abandon the ex post facto substitute, and make the commemoration national and republican. Two victories of principle, I trust, will swell the grandeur of the day: First, the return to specie payments, so that every citizen may have a piece of gold in his pocket; and secondly, the complete recognition of the equal rights of all, so that the great Declaration may be no longer a promise only but a living reality. Then will the celebration be grander than any Roman triumph; grander than any Hebrew jubilee.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I understand that this bill commits the nation to a considerable expenditure, a possible expenditure not to be reimbursed, of three or four millions of dollars. I have given the subject some reflection, and have for myself come to the conclusion that it is becoming and wise that the expense be incurred. We are not, I submit, on the verge of bankruptcy, as the communication read by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] intimated. And unless my friend who sits beside me [Mr. CAMERON] shall succeed, as I believe he will not succeed, in deranging the finances of the country, we are abundantly able to incur this expense. We may incur this expenditure if we are able to take one step beyond the absolute necessities of Government.

Mr. President, the event which we are called upon to commemorate, all recognize as one of the greatest events in the world's history, an event interesting not alone to the people of this country but to all mankind; and it is dwarfing the subject to speak of the occasion and of our republicanism being merely domestic, as the principle of government by the people or of republicanism is cosmopolitan. It interests every being of our race. It is natural and commendable that our people should desire to celebrate this great occasion, and it is most appropriate that they should wish to celebrate it in a manner that will enable mankind to join with them.

I can understand, as has been suggested, that our rejoicings might not be agreeable to the kings and potentates of the earth, and can believe that our abounding prosperity might excite their envy, and that our bright future might invoke their jealousy; but not so with the people of other lands; not so with those who have felt the incubus of hereditary caste and servitude. They would join with us in our hallelujahs. Enamored with our well-ordered freedom, they will go home to sow the seeds of blessing here gathered over the world.

Whether kings and emperors, princes and emperors, approve or disapprove, we will not be ashamed to proclaim our republican principles to the world. We will invite them to attend. They know what the entertainment is to be. If they are incapable of rejoicing with us over the progress of human liberty they can decline our invitation. If they come, who can doubt that they will receive inspirations which will prove blessings to their own people?

Besides, Mr. President, this exposition will be at once instructive and entertaining to the people of our country. Those who are accustomed to toil in shop and field will at this exhibition in a few days derive information which the wealthy obtain only by extensive travel; and while advertising their own productions, they will be gathering suggestions from the products and skill of other countries which will be advantageous to them and to our nation. Mr. President, before we vote on this question we should invoke for ourselves something of the spirit of our fathers in "the days that tried men's souls." They had the spirit which led them, without shield or protection, to meet the flaming line of battle.

There is value in a national sentiment, and to this end we should cherish our historic recollections. We, as a people, should cease to refer to and dilate upon Greece and Rome, Thermopylæ and Marathon, while we have a Bunker Hill, a Trenton, a Lexington, and a Concord of our own. We should gather our inspirations from our own Christian soil, rather than from the battered and tramped fields of heathendom. Let us celebrate this centennial in a manner becoming an epoch which is our own, and yet in which the whole world has an interest.

It would be well, I think, before taking a vote that we should read that great state paper which proclaimed our national sovereignty to the world. Webster, I remember, represents John Adams as saying in Independence Hall, before the vote on the Declaration of Independence was taken, "Read it, sir, at the head of the army, and every sword will be drawn from its scabbard, and the solemn oath be uttered, to maintain it or to die on the bed of honor. Send it to the pulpits; religion will approve it, and the lovers of civil liberty will cling to it, resolved to stand by it or fall with it. Send it to the public halls; let those hear it who heard the first roar of the enemy's cannon; let those see it who saw their sons fall at Bunker Hill, at Lexington, and at Concord, and the very walls will cry out in its favor."

Mr. President, those men who pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honors, deserve that we should on this centennial occasion remember them, even should it cost the pledge or expenditure of a few thousand dollars. Out of respect to the national sentiment of the people of the country, we have no right to withhold that legislation which is necessary to enable them to give expression to their patriotic impulses.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I regret very much that my physical condition may compel me to forbear the utterance of some things which I would like to say to-day. I regret more that I am required to rise for the purpose of answering, to some extent at least, the extraordinary speech of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER] upon this occasion. I listened with delight to his opening sentences, as I always do when he commences upon that favorite subject of his, the Declaration of Independence. I knew we would hear from him the history of that sacred instrument, and I was not disappointed when he commenced with recounting how the principles which entered into it had their origin and their triumph. I always listen to him with pleasure when he speaks of that great charter which asserts the rights of conscience and the rights of labor, the right of free men to choose their own institutions, to choose their own rulers, their own mode of worship, and to have in their own hands the products of their own toil, unless taken from them by their own consent. And when he was tracing it back to that desire of freedom which led men to flee from the forms of government which did not give them these rights, that persecution which gathered together in one advancing current the people of France and of England, of Scotland and of Ireland, of all the nations of Europe which—he prompts me to be classical—"Arethusa-like, plunged beneath the waters of the sea, and gurgled up again in light and beauty at Plymouth Rock, and Bunker Hill and Yorktown"—when he commenced that eulogy, I was not ready for the lame and impotent conclusion which followed, that the triumph of the rights of conscience and the rights of labor were not to be celebrated in the land which they had made glorious, for fear it will cost something, some dollars, to be voted by the representatives of the forty million people who are enjoying those rights.

But, Mr. President, I came not here to indulge in any sentiments of this character. The people of the United States, the Senators present, need not any Fourth of July orations upon this occasion. Faneuil Hall and Independence Hall may have their inspirations upon the Fourth of July, as they have; but, sir, I came this morning expecting in a plain and candid way, to the extent to which my strength would enable me to do it, to examine this bill as a business question before the Congress of the United States; and I hasten to get to that point. I will call attention to the original act of the 3d of March, 1871, for the purpose of seeing what we have already done, of showing that; and if there has been any mistake in the matter, any humiliating mistake, any mistake for which the Senator from Massachusetts is now sorry, perhaps he is fully as responsible for that error as any member of this body or of the House.

I hold in my hand the bill as it was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, on the 7th day of February, 1871, at which time the Senator from Massachusetts was the honored head of that committee. I am glad he has referred to it, for he has informed us that the amendment in the bill is his work, drawn with his hand; so that it cannot be said this bill passed as a matter of form, without challenging his scrutiny. Besides, we all know that, as an industrious and conscientious legislator, no bill of any importance ever came from his committee unless he was satisfied with its provisions. What, then, is the first thing that attracts attention in this bill, thus reported from the committee of which the Senator from Massachusetts was chairman? It is its title; and what does it announce to all the world?

An act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence, by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, in the city of Philadelphia, and State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1876.

Now, Mr. President, there is the announcement, in the very title of the bill, "an international exhibition." If it were such an incongruous affair as the Senator from Massachusetts now presents to us, if there were such objections to it that an international exhibition coupled with a national exhibition is a monstrosity in politics, such as the Siamese twins were in nature, why was it that the keen intellect of the Senator from Massachusetts did not point out this incongruity to the Senate, and save us this humiliation?

Mr. President, I listened with great pleasure to the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. SUMNER. May I interrupt my friend?

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield when my friend shall have allowed me to finish a sentence.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I will not follow his example; I will yield.

I say I listened with great pleasure to him when he drew upon his imagination and furnished us the picture which he gave of the grand procession of the powers of Europe, and their rulers; and now, before I proceed to the use I propose to make of it, I wil llisten to him.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will pardon me. I did yield repeatedly a few moments ago; and why I declined at last was simply that I wished to hasten to the end.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator declined my first request.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. SCOTT. The interruption is not at all disagreeable.

Mr. SUMNER. But the Senator put me a question; he asked me why, with such a title, the bill came from the committee with which I was associated. The Senator knows full well that it was a House bill; it came to the Senate and in the course of business was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and there it was considered. No individual at that time suggested a world's fair. That subject was not referred to the committee. None of the gentlemen here representing Philadelphia made any such suggestion. Therefore the title attracted no attention. It was innocuous. It was not of itself a grant of power; it did not of itself create a world's fair; and all the atmosphere about the bill at that time was inconsistent with the idea of a world's fair. The idea of a world's fair was an after-thought, an ex post facto thought.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Massachusetts is such an accurate philologist that a few moments ago he was criticising the Legislature of his own beloved Commonwealth for using the word "exposition" instead of "exhibition;" and yet with the words "international exhibition" in the very title of the bill he seeks refuge in the words "world's fair." We did not expect the barbarous nations of the world to come, but we did expect all civilized peoples of the world to come; and does the Senator from Massachusetts wish us to understand that these words "international exhibition" are repugnant to the others which he now sees proper to use—"world's fair?" Language means nothing if that title does not commit us to an international exhibition; and if that is not a synonym for a "world's fair," it is large enough at least to embrace the civilized and intelligent world.

I was proceeding when the Senator from Massachusetts interrupted me to say that I listened with pleasure to the learning which was displayed in the magnificent picture that he drew of the procession of the kingdoms of Austria, and Prussia, and Great Britain, and Russia, and Spain, and many others, interspersed with agreeable recollections, and disagreeable ones, of the monarchs and the rulers of those countries. I enjoyed the grand panorama as it passed before me while he was marshaling the nations and sovereigns, while crowns and coronets were glittering in the lovely light of a Fourth of July American sun; and I confess, Mr. President, after some of the sentences that had previously fallen from him, I was somewhat puzzled to know whether the procession was drawn from Dante's Inferno or Milton's Paradise Regained, and I felt some apprehension as to whether he was going to land them in heaven or in hell. [Laughter and applause.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Applause is out of order, and if repeated the Chair will order the galleries to be cleared.

Mr. SCOTT. But, sir, I was more surprised when the Senator from Massachusetts closed that argument by telling us that if these sovereigns accepted and came here, the eloquence of our orators would be palsied before them; that it would strike dumb the tongues that were wont to be eloquent in the vindication of republican principles. And this from the Senator from Massachusetts! The advocates of republican institutions struck dumb because crowned heads, lords, marquises, earls, or baronets or their retainers were present to listen! Why, sir, I was following that procession in imagination. I trust they will all come; and I hope to see them marshaled into Independence Square, if it is big enough to hold them, and if we ever get them there I hope to see the Senator from Massachusetts there as the orator, at least upon some occasion between the 19th of April and the 19th of October, 1876, between Lexington and Yorktown; and will his tongue fail him in the advocacy of republicanism because crowned heads are present? The memories of the past, the service of a whole life devoted to freedom, and the reputation which he looks for in posterity tell us, all these tell us, that we must forbid the assumption. He has done himself injustice. His tongue would not quail before the crowned heads of Europe, nor would the tongues of many others who, if less distinguished than he, have learned from him, during the long time that he has been in the Senate, to love freedom so well as to utter her gospel everywhere, whether men will hear or forbear. They live in a land where we have freedom to choose the worship of God and freedom, to resist the tyranny of man, and will not hesitate discreetly to do honor to the Constitution which gives us these rights, whether in the presence of serfs or titled royalty.

I have been diverted, Mr. President, thus far in my remarks from pursuing the history of this bill of which I was speaking. It was reported on the 7th of February, 1871. Now, what is its legislative history? It came from the House, as is already stated. It was not a Pennsylvania measure; it was not a Philadelphia measure solely. I refer to its origin, for I know something of it. The bill was introduced into the House, it is true, by a Representative from Pennsylvania, not a Philadelphian—a man who represented a district spanning the Alleghany Mountains, running across them to some distance on either side their base, and having his home on the western slope. He was a native of Maine, an adopted, an honored, and an honorable son of Pennsylvania. He bore the same name as my honored friend who sits before me; I allude to Hon. Daniel J. Morrell, the Representative from the then seventeenth district of Pennsylvania. It was not a provincial measure; but on every feature of it was written, as broadly as it could be, a national measure, and an international measure in the title of it.

It came from the House, and was reported back to the Senate with but one amendment; and what was that? It was drawn, as we are now informed, by the pen of the Senator from Massachusetts, and that was, he added to the clause which prohibited payment to the commissioners authorized by that bill these words:

And the United States shall not be liable for any expense attending such exhibition or by reason of the same.

The very amendment suggested all the questions about national and international exhibition, and the Senator was the author of it. The bill came back to the Senate on the 7th of February, 1871, as I have stated; and it was considered upon several occasions. What amendments were offered to it? But one. No question was made as to whether it should be a national or an international exhibition, except one by the Senator from Ohio who sits on my left, [Mr. THURMAN,] who made the inquiry whether it was to be an international exhibition or not; and he was referred to the bill, according to my recollection. The Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] in remarks made by him, called attention expressly to the fact, so that the Senate might consider the importance of the measure which they were passing. I quote his words:

If, however, the United States are to stand sponsor, if the celebration is to be national, if it is to be held under the auspices of the Government and patronized by the nation, then my honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] will agree with me that care should be taken to make it not only creditable, but to insure its being conducted in the best way.

Attention was called to this fact; and attention being thus called to it, only one other question remained—where shall it be held? The bill named Philadelphia. The Senator from New York moved to insert New York; and for some time after that motion was made discussion went on in this Chamber. While the discussion was progressing, the then Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. WILSON, in his seat suggested Boston, but he did not offer an amendment. The Senate had distinctly before them Philadelphia, New York, and Boston; and upon the vote being taken, New York was not adopted; Philadelphia was. Boston was not pressed; and if it had been, and adopted, is it too much to say that perhaps the resolution of the Legislature of Massachusetts might never have seen the light? And that resolution is the only excuse I can find to send down to history for the position taken by my friend this morning upon this bill. It is the only thing which will reconcile the glowing exordium upon the Declaration of Independence, and that peroration which concluded that it would cost too much money to commemorate the great event. Think of it, "human rights" too light to be weighed in the scales against a few million dollars, the Senator from Massachusetts being judge!

Thus, sir, the bill passed, and what does it provide? Let us see. I do not wish to read the whole of it, but simply to refer to those things which must have fixed in the mind of the Senate the character of this exhibition.

In the preamble of the bill what do we find? It is to be "an exhibition of the natural resources of the country and their development," and I shall save my friend's philological sensitiveness by saying that the Representative from Pennsylvania did use the word which the Legislature of Massachusetts omitted to use, and has shocked his sensibility by interpolating another—"an exhibition of the natural resources of the country and their development, and of its progress in those arts which benefit mankind in comparison with those of older nations."

How were they to be compared if they were not brought here? Does it not all contemplate an international exhibition? Then it goes further and says, that it is to be an international exhibition—in the first section, "an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures shall be held, under the auspices of the Government of the United States." Now, what could be more decisive than these three things, an "international exhibition" in the title; an exhibition of arts and products in comparison with those of older nations, an exhibition of American and foreign arts; and all this under the auspices of the Government of the United States? These three things being determined, that there was to be an international exhibition of foreign products and arts under the auspices of the Government of the United States, there were only two questions left: where shall it be held, and by what means shall it be brought about? The first question was settled by fixing Philadelphia, appropriately as is stated by the President in his message, appropriately, I think, as was agreed by everybody; for when the vote came nobody even demanded the yeas and nays upon it. That it was to be national is apparent in every section of the bill.

The third section provided for the appointment of commissioners by the President upon the nomination of the governors of the States and Territories.

The sixth section required the commission to report to Congress, and among the things to be reported to Congress are the following:

The requisite custom-house regulations for the introduction into this country of the articles from foreign countries intended for exhibition, and such other matters as in their judgment may be important.

It is hard to see what custom-house regulations were needed if this exhibition were not to be international.

Then it provided, in the eighth section—

That whenever the President shall be informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purpose, and for the exclusive control by the commission—giving national control—

herein provided for of the proposed exhibition, the President shall, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, setting forth the time at which the exhibition will open, and the place at which it will be held; and he shall communicate to the diplomatic representatives of all nations copies of the same, together with such regulations as may be adopted by the commissioners.

Mr. President, if there had been an effort made to scatter all through this act of Congress from the beginning to the end notice to the nation, notice to the world, that it was to be a national and an international exhibition, I can hardly see how that effort could have been more successful.

I shall endeavor now, sir, to proceed simply in the way of narration as to what followed the passage of this act.

Of course the first question that presented itself was, how is money to be procured for the purpose of making this exhibition successful? After the lapse of one year, the gentlemen who had it in charge came to the conclusion that the only mode of making it successful was to apply to Congress for the charter of a board of finance, or a finance commission, as I believe it is termed. They did so; and it was proposed to raise the money necessary by the subscription of corporate stock, putting the estimate at ten millions, supposing that amount would be necessary. I may say here in passing, that the idea has never been held out by any one connected with this institution that this subscription of corporate stock was to be a speculation. I have been present at some of the meetings that have been held; I have participated in some of them; and I know the gentlemen who have been invited to subscribe have been invited upon the assurance that no guarantee could be given of the return of one dollar; that it must take its chance of all the casualties to which such an exhibition would be subject—fire, flood, storm, the breaking out of an epidemic, or any of the numerous incidents which might interfere with its success.

That commission was formed, and they proceeded to apportion upon the population of the United States the amount which they believed each State ought to contribute for the purpose of raising that $10,000,000. I have here the apportionment which was made, but I do not deem it necessary to take up time in reading it. The amount apportioned upon the population of Pennsylvania was not quite $1,000,000—between nine hundred and fifty thousand and one million dollars. They proceeded to organize the commission and to organize a board of finance, and I wish here to say that it is composed of gentlemen of the most faultless integrity, whose commercial and personal character is such as to give guarantee for the administration of any fund that comes into their hands. If any fund that may be appropriated, either with or without governmental supervision, (and they are quite indifferent as to that but rather invite it,) if the whole fund received in any manner is not secure in the hands of these men, then I agree that instead of talking about celebrating the centennial anniversary of independence, we ought to be talking about writing the epitaph of the nation. It is secure.

But they proceeded; and the financial aspect of the case, as that is the one upon which I have been requested by some Senators to speak, is this: The Legislature of Pennsylvania appropriated $1,000,000 to this enterprise; the councils of Philadelphia appropriated $500,000; thus making a million and a half, with the stipulation that that million and a half was to be used in the erection of a permanent building, that was to remain upon the grounds as an art gallery, commemorative of this event—a memorial building.

The finance commission then proceeded to canvass for subscriptions, and the citizens of Philadelphia and of the State of Pennsylvania subscribed about one million and a half more, thus making three millions, or nearly one-third of the whole proposed amount, and three times the quota assessed upon the State of Pennsylvania.

When this had been done the governor of the Commonwealth was notified of it. The finance commission was proceeding to organize throughout all the States, and they expected to secure their subscriptions, although up to that time the other States had not responded. But with three millions certified to be secure within the knowledge of the governor, he gave the certificate required by the act of 1871 to the President, and upon the 4th of July, 1873, the park commission of the city of Philadelphia formally delivered a conveyance of, I believe, four hundred and fifty acres, or in that neighborhood, to the centennial commission, for the purpose of the celebration. Therefore they have absolute and exclusive control of those four hundred and fifty acres of land, in the most magnificent park on this continent or in any country. The President then issued his proclamation; and now I come to that which is the occasion of the bill immediately before us. What was that proclamation? It recites these various acts, and it concludes thus:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress aforesaid, do hereby declare and proclaim that there will be held, at the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, to be opened on the 19th day of April, anno Domini 1876, and to be closed on the 19th day of October, in the same year.

And in the interest of peace, civilization, and domestic and international friendship and intercourse, I commend the celebration and exhibition to the people of the United States.

Now mark it.

And, in behalf of this Government and people, I cordially commend them to all nations who may be pleased to take part therein. * * * *

Done at the city of Washington this 3d day of July, 1873, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.

There, sir, is a commendation of this exhibition to other nations, and that was the extent to which the President deemed himself authorized to go. Some nations, treating this as really an invitation, have accepted it as such; not one power alone, as the Senator from Ohio has suggested.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator will allow me to correct him.

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly; if I have made an error I wish to be corrected.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator is certainly in error. He says that all the President has done is to issue his proclamation. So far from that, there was sent from the office of the Secretary of State——

Mr. SCOTT. I cannot read all these papers at once. I will come to that——

Mr. THURMAN. A direct invitation.

Mr. SCOTT. I will come to that, and to what the Secretary of State says on that subject. The Senator from Ohio may rest assured that I desire to get the whole subject before the Senate, and I shall be only too glad, if I omit anything, to have his valuable aid in presenting whatever I omit.

That was on the 3d of July, 1873, the day before the formal transfer of the grounds in Philadelphia to the commission.

Now, sir, I come to what the Senator from Ohio refers to, to the invitation, I suppose, as he terms it, dated July 5, 1873, issued from the Department of State. I do not wish to read it all, but I suppose what the Senator refers to is this:

In the law providing for the holding of the exhibition, Congress directed that copies of the proclamation of the President, setting forth the time of its opening and the place at which it was to be held, together with such regulations as might be adopted by the commissioners of the exhibition, should be communicated to the diplomatic representatives of all nations. Copies of those regulations are herewith transmitted.

The President indulges the hope that the Government of —— will be pleased to notice the subject, and may deem it proper to bring the exhibition and its objects to the attention of the people of that country, and thus encourage their co-operation in the proposed celebration. And he further hopes that the opportunity afforded by the exhibition for the interchange of national sentiment and friendly intercourse between the people of both nations may result in new and still greater advantages to science and industry, and at the same time serve to strengthen the bonds of peace and friendship which already happily subsist between the government and people of —— and those of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that that is not an invitation sent by the President through the Secretary of State to foreign powers, but it is a form of notice sent by the Secretary of State to our own foreign ministers, and I now follow it with a letter of the Secretary of State which corrects a misapprehension into which our own officers fell in construing that very letter, and that is the occasion for this bill. I allude to circular No. 48, issued by the Department of State, which has been communicated to the president of the centennial commission. It is dated November 3, 1873, and is from the Secretary of State. I will read a portion of it:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 3, 1873.

To the Diplomatic Officers of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: I regret to find that misapprehension has arisen in a certain quarter as to the meaning of the proclamation of the President of the 3d of July last relative to the centennial exposition—

My friend from Massachusetts will have to find fault in another quarter. Here is "exposition" again—to be held in Philadelphia in commemoration of the Independence of the United States. It is therefore deemed necessary to make the following communication for your information and guidance.

It will be observed that the President in his proclamation has extended no invitation to foreign powers to participate in the exhibition. He was not authorized so to do, and while he desires to attract as much attention and interest as possible thereto he carefully confines himself to "commending" the celebration of the centennial anniversary of American Independence, and the exhibition which is to be held in connection therewith, to all nations who may be pleased to take part therein.

It is presumed that you will not have failed to observe the guarded language of the President's proclamation, and the difference between it and that which would be used in extending an invitation to other powers.

He proceeds to say the exhibition is not national in the sense of being governmental, and to express the President's hope that foreign powers will take interest and co-operate in the celebration.

This is quite a long communication, but I have read enough to show that the Secretary of State deemed it his duty to correct a misapprehension into which our own foreign ministers fell in considering this to be an invitation.

Now, Mr. President, it is not proposed by this bill to extend an invitation to all the crowned heads of Europe to come here and be entertained as the guests of the nation. The nation is not to be the host in the enlarged sense in which the Senator from Massachusetts used that term; but the intention is to extend an invitation to the people of those countries through and with the sanction of their governments, with the expectation that those governments will appoint commissioners to come and take charge of the interests of those of their people who may see proper to participate, just as we sent commissioners to Paris in 1867, to Vienna in 1873, and, if I mistake not—although of that I am not certain—to London in 1851. Those governments did not pay the expenses of our commissioners. If these dignitaries saw proper to invite them to dine, very well; and a commissioner might feel good with his legs under the royal mahogany. If the President sees proper to invite anybody who comes here to dine, very well. But it is well understood abroad that we are a plain, republican people; that we do not expect to build palaces for the accommodation of royal visitors; and if they see proper to come, they will have good sense enough to put up with republican fare.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask my friend a question at this point? I am seeking all the information I can get.

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator, by this part of his argument, mean to convince us, or to declare his own opinion, that we shall be at liberty hereafter to refuse to appropriate money to carry on this exhibition or exposition? Does he mean, by what he is saying now, to disabuse the Senate of the idea that, by adopting the pending bill, Congress will stand committed past recall to make such appropriations as shall turn out in the future to be necessary to accomplish this work?

Mr. SCOTT. The idea has been suggested that the amount of money that would be needed for this exhibition would be enormous. It was stated, I believe, by the Senator from Massachusetts to run from $5,000,000 to $15,000,000, and perhaps over that. I have been combating the idea that this is to be a very expensive exhibition, and that among the expenses to be defrayed by these commissioners will be anything for hospitalities to be extended by the nation to those who may see proper to come here. So far as Congress is already committed, it is committed to an international exposition. So far as the expenses are concerned, it was expected that they would be raised by private contribution to this stock. But I was proceeding with an effort at order in showing the point at which we have arrived; and I will say to the Senator from New York now, that I think we have arrived at that point where Pennsylvania and Philadelphia have done much, where the rest of the country has done comparatively nothing, and where, if the international exposition is to fail, it will be because Congress now refuses to recognize the obligation which I think they have incurred, to make this an international exhibition. It may cost $3,000,000. That is fixed as the present amount needed for putting it in such shape as to make it beyond all controversy a success. It may cost $5,000,000, although I do not suppose it will, in addition to the receipts which will come in at the time of the exhibition, and which will be used in defraying a part of the expense.

Mr. SARGENT. Do I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania now to say that that is the amount to be appropriated by Congress—from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000?

Mr. SCOTT. I have understood, from very careful estimates made by the board of finance connected with this centennial exposition, that if Congress will appropriate $3,000,000 at the present time—$1,500,000 to be paid during the next fiscal year, and the other $1,500,000 in the year following—that that will enable them to put this exhibition on such a basis as to insure its success, considering the additional contributions they can thereby secure, the receipt of which they may feel reasonably certain, and the proceeds of the buildings, which will be removed after the exposition shall have terminated.

That I believe to be a fair and candid statement of the present financial position of the question as viewed by gentlemen who are conscientious on this subject, who wish to carry out the original national and international idea, but who do not wish to proceed and make contracts for buildings and other expenses when they are not assured that the money will be in some manner forthcoming to discharge the obligations which they thus incur. They are men of mercantile and personal honor. They do not intend to deceive the nation; they do not intend to deceive anybody. They come here, after having made efforts such as I think very few private citizens have ever made at their own expense, such as very few citizens have ever made at the cost of so much labor, for a great national purpose of this character, candidly presenting this question to the Congress of the United States, showing where we stand, showing that it was intended to be an international and national exhibition, showing what position they are in now financially, and leaving the question to Congress of whether we will, after what has occurred, withdraw this quasi invitation which has gone out to the nations of the earth.

I have been again diverted, Mr. President; and this is a very rambling speech, and a much longer one than I either intended or expected to make.

Mr. NORWOOD. I desire to understand the exact position of the Senator. I wish to know whether, in answer to the question put by the Senator from New York, the Senator from Pennsylvania takes the ground that he considers the Government already committed to make an appropriation for the purpose of carrying on this exhibition?

Mr. SCOTT. I consider the Government committed to make this a successful national and international exhibition. I think we cannot with credit to ourselves recede from the position which we have taken; and I am just coming to that point, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. NORWOOD. Allow me one word more and I will not interrupt the Senator further. Before he takes his seat I should like him, as a good constitutional lawyer, to point out the authority under which he thinks we can make such an appropriation.

Mr. SCOTT. I trust my strength will enable me to respond to the Senator from Georgia; but for the present I proceed with what I have in hand. Before this proclamation had been issued, and before this letter of the Secretary of State, there had been some acceptances. The report of the president of the centennial commission states to us that invitations have been accepted by the following nations, and these are all of them, except Sweden, which was announced this morning by the Senator from Minnesota—the German Empire, the Netherlands, Belgium, Mexico, Ecuador, and Hayti.

Something was said about only one first-class power having responded. Well, Mr. President, we do not expect this exhibition to be made up altogether of first-class powers. Will the Senator from Massachusetts exclude from this grand centennial jubilee of freedom the dusky sons of Hayti if they come, because they are not a first-class power?

Mr. SUMNER. We do not invite them.

Mr. SCOTT. If they come, I say; and, certainly, if we are to invite anybody they will be included within the broad terms of our invitation. Here are Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium, Mexico, Ecuador, Hayti, and Sweden. If I had time to refer to statistical tables I might probably show that these contain a very considerable proportion of the population of the civilized world. I think I might show that we are now, by the acceptances of these invitations, in a position in which it would puzzle all the learning and all the eloquence and all the diplomacy of the Senator from Massachusetts to write a polite note to these people telling them not to come. I should like to see the phrase in which he would put it. An act of Congress for an international exhibition; $3,000,000 subscribed by one Commonwealth; a deed made for four hundred and fifty acres of land upon which to hold it; the artisans of the Old World already making their preparations to bring their products here—many large manufacturing establishments have given that notice already; six nations accepting the invitation. How will the Senator from Massachusetts sit down, how will the Secretary of State sit down, to write to these governments and say, "True, you were bidden to this marriage feast of nations, but you must not come; we cannot afford it?"

Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] in his place yesterday, when the subject of money was started, made the very sensible remark that character was involved in this bill; and who will say it is not? National character; an invitation sent abroad to our consuls and ministers in such form that they considered it an invitation; these nations of the earth accepting it; then a letter from the Secretary of State saying, this is a misapprehension; it is only a commendation, it is not an invitation. Then, the enterprise must break down, because at the time when it was in the full tide of successful experiment, and the commissioners believed that success was within their grasp, the panic came, and all the arrangements which they had made in all the other States were entirely frustrated. Had not the panic come in September, the movement inaugurated on the 4th of July, I feel satisfied, would have been successful before this time. The patriotism of the country assures us of that. Look at the resolutions passed by New Hampshire; and, I believe, North Carolina; at the resolutions passed by some of the territorial Legislatures; a subscription sent here from the-far off Arizona; Oregon declaring in favor of it; the eyes of the world turned upon our nation, because all our people who went to Vienna were speaking then of the exhibition in 1876, and they were told that Europe would be represented here. With all this, are we to undergo the humiliation of saying that the people of the United States will not sustain their representatives in voting three, five, eight millions if necessary, for the purpose of commemorating in a fitting way the centennial anniversary of the nation's birth?

I am reminded by the Senator from Georgia that he would like to have more light upon the question of our power to appropriate this money. I am glad that he has put that question. I heard it suggested once or twice by others. I believe the clause of the Constitution was once quoted upon this question which authorizes Congress—

To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

I believe I have heard the construction which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] puts upon that clause, and I am not sure that I disagree with him that it is to be treated as if it read that Congress has the power to lay taxes, imposts, and duties in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and the general welfare. In examining a question of constitutional power, the continued and almost unquestioned practice of Congress is to be considered; and I propose briefly to ask the attention of the Senator from Georgia to a few of the practical exercises of the power for the purpose of promoting industry, science, learning, and art. These alone strongly argue sufficient warrant to Congress to follow in the footsteps which have been trodden so long and by so many of our eminent predecessors.

We passed an act authorizing an expedition to the North Pole for the purpose of exploring what there is in that region, and the Senator from Massachusetts, if I recollect aright, certainly believed in the constitutionality of that.

Mr. SUMNER. I reported it.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Massachusetts reported it; so that it has his authority as a constitutional lawyer, and where could I quote a greater?

We passed an act to procure instruments for observing the transit of Venus; and I am not sure but that the Senator from Georgia voted for it, for we passed it since he came into the Senate. I do not think his vote is recorded against it. I am reminded by this observation of the transit of Venus that we made an appropriation no later than yesterday, in the naval appropriation bill, for the prosecution of works upon the new planets. The language would almost seem to imply that the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] who had charge of that bill contemplated the building of a railroad or canal in some of the newly-discovered planets; but I suppose it referred to astronomical work done in the observatory here. We did that yesterday, and no voice was raised against the constitutional power to appropriate money to pursue such an astronomical investigation.

We have passed acts sending commissioners at various times to expositions of this character in foreign countries. We sent them to Vienna last year; we sent them to Paris in 1867; we sent them at a cost of nearly $500,000, printing and all; we sent them, I think, to London in 1851; and if we have power to appropriate money to pay the expenses of going to foreign lands to compete with these people in the products of art and industry, surely the nation, built upon the rock of the Declaration of Independence, has a right to appropriate a few millions to an exhibition at home to compare the products of the nation which stands upon that rock with the products of the nations to which we have sent our own commissioners and whose invitations we accepted.

But we have passed an act time after time to publish the Smithsonian report.

We have passed an act to provide for the propagation of fish in all the rivers in all the States. Georgia may be invaded perhaps by the fish commissioners depositing the eggs of salmon and trout for the purpose of feeding the people of Georgia, and I am sure my friend from Georgia will not be troubled with any constitutional scruples when he is enjoying the flavor of Portland salmon taken from Savannah River, if they ever get there.

We passed an act for geological explorations, and every year we publish Hayden's report and Raymond's report about the geology of the Western Territories.

We keep up an Agricultural Department and a Bureau of Education.

We passed an act a few days ago to put busts of the Chief Justices in the room of the Supreme Court of the United States; and now might I not ask the Senator from Georgia, who I have no doubt voted for that, under what clause of the Constitution did he find the power?

Mr. NORWOOD. What act do you refer to?

Mr. SCOTT. I am referring to the purchase of busts of the Chief Justices to put in the room of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. THURMAN. That was under the same clause under which we built the house for them to sit in.

Mr. SCOTT. And what clause is that? Busts are not necessary for the Government. There may be a great many people get on them who administer the Government, but they are not absolutely necessary. [Laughter.]

I might go on with these instances ad infinitum.

We built a statue of General Scott in one of the squares of this city and appropriated $40,000 to buy one slab for the old general to stand on.

We keep up a library of Congress; and I suppose upon a strict construction every man here ought to bring his own library with him or quote no books.

We bought Moran's painting of the Yellowstone and paid $10,000 for it, and under what clause of the Constitution?

Surely, if anything can be settled, it is settled that in providing for the general intelligence of the people, for their culture, for the progress of our nation, for, in short, promoting the two great bases upon which the nation stands, the intelligence and virtue of the people—if anything can be established, it is established by acts innumerable in the history of the Government that we have the right to do this.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the clause regulating commerce.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Ohio suggests that the clause authorizing the regulation of commerce may authorize it. I do not propose to go into any specific grant of power upon this question; but I think in the whole mass of governmental powers, if there is anything established, it is the power of Congress to do just the thing which we propose to do here. I am glad the Senator from Georgia asked the question, for it gave me the opportunity to refer to these instances.

Mr. NORWOOD. The answer of the Senator from Pennsylvania is not the answer I wanted him to make. I wanted him to discuss the constitutional power, and not refer to innumerable precedents which he thinks would form the basis for making another precedent of the same kind. I grant that all these things have been done that the Senator, considers have been done by Congress, but he is simply referring me to precedents for the exercise of a power as an answer to the constitutional question as to whether we could do it constitutionally. I do not say that in many of the cases referred to by the Senator Congress would not have the power; but to answer me by stating cases where the power has been exercised, I do not think is exactly answering the question.

Mr. SCOTT. As the Senator from Georgia has been giving much more consideration to the constitutional question than I have, and I know him to be a good constitutional lawyer, I have cited here some eighteen or twenty instances. Will he permit me to ask him under what specific clause of the Constitution it is that any one of these appropriations has been made, or whether he believes they are all violations of the Constitution?

Mr. NORWOOD. I am not prepared just now to discuss the question. I wanted information from the Senator. If he can convince me that this can be done constitutionally, be it so. I do not say it cannot be done; but I want more light on the subject. I may express a doubt as to the constitutionality of a great many of the laws which he says have been passed for the purposes named by him. He and myself differ very largely as to the constitutional power of Congress. He thought that Congress had the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus at a certain time when I did not think it had the power at all, because the state of facts did not exist which warranted it. He believes in the power of Congress to pass the reconstruction acts, and a great many other acts which I do not believe Congress has the power to pass. But upon this point, which is a doubtful point, I want light from him as to whether we have the constitutional power to vote three or five or fifty millions for a centennial anniversary; and if we do that, whether we cannot vote a large amount for an annual celebration.

Mr. SCOTT. There are certain ends and purposes in the Constitution which Congress is authorized to promote. There are many of them. There is one very broad phrase, "the general welfare of the people of the United States." I have already stated to him that this is one means of promoting their general welfare, by cultivating their taste for art, by promoting industry, by encouraging competition in the various manufacturing and industrial pursuits; and if any one of these ends is within the power of Congress, Congress is the judge of the means by which that end is to be promoted.

Mr. President, I am surprised that I have talked so long on this subject. That I have done so is due very much to the many interruptions which have been made, though I do not complain of them, for I desire the Senate to understand the subject. I have endeavored to explain the origin of the bill, its history, its provisions, for the purpose of showing that this is a great national and international project. I have, I confess, sometimes been pained upon this floor when gentlemen have spoken of it as a Pennsylvania project, as one which the Senators from Pennsylvania were particularly interested in. I look upon it, sir, as a great national project, and have been endeavoring to show that Congress has made it such, and to show, moreover, that, if it fail as such, the skirts of Pennsylvania will be clear of the disgrace, if disgrace there be. I wish, as a Senator from Pennsylvania, to have that understood. We have done all we ever promised to do. We have done as much as we were ever expected to do. We have contributed more than the proportion which would be allotted to us either upon wealth or population. A panic has prevented the success of this enterprise elsewhere; and if it is to fail, if these invitations are to be recalled, if this humiliating explanation is to be made to the nations which have accepted them, then, sir, we shall wash our hands of the blame. But we do not wish even to be considered selfish or provincial to that extent. We trust we are national, and that we cherish the honor of the nation as dearly as we do the honor of Pennsylvania.

We have seen some things since the arrangements for this centennial exhibition have been in progress that make it dangerous to recede. I have been in meetings with men from Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, South Carolina, and Massachusetts, at some of the meetings which have occurred with reference to this subject. The sentiments which were brought forth by the communion, by the interchange of thought between men from different sections of the Union, the warm blood which started in the veins of men from the North and the South, the clasp of the hand with that cordiality of old which sprang from the recollections of that common Fourth of July, 1776—all these admonish us that when we propose to abandon either the national or the international character of this exhibition, we may abandon the best opportunity that will ever offer for effacing the passions and the bitterness left by the war. It is just as necessary for an appropriation to make it national as it is to make it international. It cannot proceed at present unless an appropriation is made, even as a national exposition.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. If I understand the Senator he says that it would be a disgrace to the Government if this appropriation is not made, because, he says, invitations have already been extended to foreign nations to visit this international exhibition. Then what is the use of this bill? This bill is but to authorize the President "to extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations;" and if that has already been done, and the invitation has already been accepted, why is it that this bill becomes necessary?

Mr. SCOTT. I am very unfortunate in not having had the attention of the Senator from Kentucky. He was out of his seat, I believe, when I read the acceptance of foreign nations in response to a supposed invitation, and read a communication of the Secretary of State, sent to our foreign representatives, stating that they misunderstood the proclamation of the President when they supposed it was an invitation. It therefore becomes necessary to pass this act to remove that misapprehension.

Now, sir, I have said that we believe in Pennsylvania that we are national; we believe that we have the interests of the whole nation at heart as much as we have those of the State; and believing that, we do not wish to see this exposition fail, either as a national or international exposition. We desire to see, even if it puts us to some inconvenience, that grand procession, which will be a landmark in the annals of the nation, that marched forth with such majestic pace from the prolific imagination of the Senator from Massachusetts this morning. We desire to see with them the second-class powers too—the dusky sons of Hayti we hope to see; the newly enfranchised race from the South we hope to see. We hope to see them from all lands and from all climes. We hope to be able to accommodate them in simple republican style; even if we do speak of republican principles, to do so not offensively. We do not expect to bring our guests here and say, "Look at the result of our institutions, and be ashamed of your own." We do not expect from them any such narrow feeling, nor to exhibit it ourselves. That feeling of hostility is not entertained by the nations that we invite here. Why, sir, did I deem it appropriate, or were it proper for me to do so, I might say to the Senator from Massachusetts that to talk about the incongruity of republican and monarchical nations, of the people of America and the people of Europe uniting in an exhibition of art and industry, is an anachronism after the award at Geneva.

If there was rancor toward England following 1776 or 1812; if there was asperity felt by our own people after the late rebellion was over, had ever nation better assurance that the Government was not hostile unto hatred? What, sir, is the spectacle? An army upon our soil at the close of the war, such as no civilized nation ever saw stand upon the earth; a people smarting, for the time being, under the sense of violated national right; a leader at the head of that army who commanded its confidence in as high a degree as was ever possessed by any of the great captains of the earth, and that leader soon after our President. If we had been rancorous, and wished to spring at the throat of the people of England, all that was necessary was to say the word, and we could have had in a month a war such as the world has never witnessed. But, sir, "Let us have peace," were the words that rang throughout this republican atmosphere.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish to interrupt my colleague. We all know that he is not in very good health, and I do not want him to injure himself; therefore I will move that we go into executive session.

Mr. SCOTT. I shall finish in ten minutes; and would rather do so than retain the floor.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well.

Mr. SCOTT. I have said, sir, that if we had been disposed to be rancorous, then was the time when it would have manifested itself; but after commissioners were appointed, and met and sat on the shore of Lake Geneva, giving to that beauteous spot a new historic memory that will eclipse all the great events that have transpired upon its shores after that tribunal sat, and there we buried deep in the bright alpine waters the sword; it is too late to talk about antagonism at the centennial exhibition between the monarchies of Europe and the Republic of America. There is no such incongruity; they will not make such a monstrosity as will cause one to die and the other to follow in death like the Siamese twins, to repeat the Senator's simile.

I trust that when we come to vote upon this bill we shall have the emphatic indorsement of the American people, through their representatives, for this great international and national exhibition; and that through it the principles we purpose to commemorate will be promoted, and will continue in undiminished prosperity our great nation, to stand up as a beacon-light to all the world after all of us who shall witness the glories of the centennial year shall have been gathered to and mingled with our native dust.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. STEWART. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 2213) granting a pension to Mrs. Cynthia McPherson, mother of the late General James B. McPherson;

A bill (H. R. No. 2209) granting a pension to Louisa H. Canby, widow of the late General E. R. S. Canby;

A bill (H. R. No. 2212) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret S. Meade, widow of Major-General George G. Meade; and

A bill (H. R. No. 64) restoring the pension of Frances C. Elliott, widow of Commodore Jesse D. Elliott, late of the United States Navy.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. No. 519) to grant an American register to the Canadian tug Noah P. Sprague; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2206) to grant an American register to the bark Azor.

The bill (H. R. No. 2208) authorizing the President to reinstate George M. Book on the active list of the Navy, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMERON and Mr. SARGENT claimed the floor.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senators yield to me one moment? I desire to say that on Monday next, after the expiration of the morning hour and the disposition of this pending bill, if there should be time I will ask the Senate to take up and consider the bill I introduced for a new election in Louisiana, for the purpose of enabling me to submit a few remarks on that bill.

Mr. WEST. Having in charge, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, the Army appropriation bill as passed by the House of Representatives and reported by the committee, I shall feel it my duty, whenever an opportunity offers, and at the expiration of the morning hour, to ask the Senate to take that bill under consideration.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I believe I had the floor.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to be recognized as having the floor on this centennial bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Pennsylvania gave way to the Senator from California, that he might rise to be recognized to-morrow when this bill comes up.

Mr. SARGENT. I yield to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON. Feeling that this subject cannot be ended to-day, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After an hour spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 27, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. BECK. I desire to make a personal explanation. The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] notified me, yesterday morning, that he would be unavoidably absent, and desired that when the bill for the restoration of the franking privilege should be voted upon I should make that announcement. He made the same request of one of his colleagues, who, when the vote was taken, thought that I had made the announcement, while I thought he had done so. In this way we both neglected the matter. I make this statement in justice to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I am reported as saying yesterday that the school teachers of this District have not been paid for twelve months. I said they had not been paid for many months.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS, ETC.

Mr. HUBBELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2203) to amend the act entitled "An act to reduce duties on imports and to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1872; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. TYNER. I rise to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House yesterday refused to pass House bill No. 825, in relation to the distribution of public documents. If the House will bear with me a moment, I will say that after awhile, when the seats here shall be full, I will call up this motion; my purpose being, if the motion to reconsider shall prevail, to move the recommitment of the bill to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, with instructions to report back only the third section—that relating to the free circulation of newspapers in the county of their publication and free exchanges between publishers.

Mr. SHANKS. Will that question be debatable?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. SHANKS. Very well.

EXECUTION OF THE LAWS IN UTAH.

Mr. McKEE, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Territories a bill (H. R. No. 2204) concerning the execution of the laws in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PARSONS. I desire to present a unanimous report from the Committee on Commerce, the consideration of which will take us but a few moments. The measure is one of very great importance to my constituents; and as the spring is approaching, the bill, if passed at all, should be passed promptly.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. PARSONS. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will not object to this.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour now begins at twelve minutes after twelve o'clock; and the call of committees will be resumed for reports of a private nature.

J. SNOWDEN & SON.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, reported back from the Committee on Claims the bill (H. R. No. 1062) referring the claims of J. Snowden & Son to the Court of Claims, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES H. LADD.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported back the petition of Charles H. Ladd, for compensation for use of real estate by the United States during the war, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH MONTANARI.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 311) for the relief of Joseph Montanari, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

P. HORNBROOK.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2205) for the relief of P. Hornbrook; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

CANADIAN TUG NOAH P. SPRAGUE.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 519) to grant an American register to the Canadian tug Noah P. Sprague.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the American-built Canadian tug Noah P. Sprague, owned by Edward Evans, of Tonawanda, Niagara County, State of New York; the tug having been recently rebuilt in the city of Buffalo.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BARK AZOR.

Mr. HOOPER, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2206) to grant an American register to the bark Azor; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the bark Azor, an American-built vessel, employed as a packet between the island of Fayal and the United States, which had been transferred to a British subject in 1863, and retransferred to the heirs of Charles W. Dabney, late consul of the United States in the island of Fayal.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEASING MARINE HOSPITAL AT CLEVELAND.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed unanimously by the Committee on Commerce to report back a bill (H. R. No. 1927) authorizing the lease of the marine hospital and grounds at Cleveland, Ohio, to the city of Cleveland, with the recommendation that it do pass; and I would like to know whether I can have unanimous consent to make that report under the present call.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to that bill being considered in the House to-day?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I object.

W. H. M'KINNEY.

Mr. HAYS, from the Committee on Agriculture, made an adverse report on the petition of W. H. McKinney; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

EXCHANGE OF COTTON-SEED WITH EGYPT.

Mr. HAYS also, from the same committee, reported back adversely a joint resolution (H. R. No. 40) relative to the exchange of the seed of the cotton-plant between this Government and the Khedive of Egypt; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

CREDITORS OF THE SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. LAWSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 420) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to discharge certain obligations of the United States to the creditors of the Upper and Lower bands of Sioux Indians, with the unanimous recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report was ordered to be printed.

ROBERT BENT AND JACK SMITH.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (S. No. 204) for the relief of Robert Bent and Jack Smith, with sundry amendments.

The bill and amendments were ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

JAMES M. TRUE.

Mr. GUNCKEL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2207) for the relief of James M. True, late colonel of the Sixty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

PROMOTION IN INSPECTOR-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back a bill (H. R. No. 2131) to authorize a promotion in the Inspector-General's Department of the Army of the United States, with the recommendation that it do pass. I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as it is a public bill.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. It provides for the promotion only of a single person.

The SPEAKER. It is then a private bill.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

J. B. DENNIS.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of J. B. Dennis, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

THOMAS GALLOWAY.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Thomas Galloway, late captain of Company C, First Maryland Volunteer Cavalry; and that the same be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

GEORGE M. BOOK, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. SCOFIELD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2208) authorizing the President to reinstate George M. Book on the active list of the Navy; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to reinstate George M. Book on the active list of the Navy, provided he shall have first successfully passed the examinations provided for in the first, second, third, and fourth sections of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish and equalize the grade of line officers of the United States Navy,'" approved April 21, 1864.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SENER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BECK & WIRTH.

Mr. DUNNELL. Not having been in my seat when the Committee on Claims was called, I desire now to report from that committee a bill for the relief of Beck & Wirth.

There was no objection, and the bill (H. R. No. 2211) was read a first and second time, referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT CLEVELAND.

Mr. PARSONS. I ask unanimous consent to report, from the Committee on Commerce, a bill (H. R. No. 2210) authorizing the lease of the marine hospital and grounds at Cleveland, Ohio, to the city of Cleveland, for hospital purposes, that it may go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. It is reported unanimously by the committee.

Mr. COBURN. I object to the reference to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. This is a public building, and the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The objection is well taken. The bill will go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PARSONS. That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

The bill, having been read a first and second time, was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

MRS. LOUISA H. CANBY.

Mr. McJUNKIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2209) granting a pension to Louisa H. Canby, widow of the late General E. R. S. Canby; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. McJUNKIN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MAYNARD. This bill is a very peculiar one. The claim for a pension rests on a very high order of merit. And I would suggest that by unanimous consent it should now be put upon its passage.

Mr. COBURN. Let it be read.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Louisa H. Canby, widow of Edward R. S. Canby, late brigadier-general United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of fifty dollars per month from and after the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill may be considered in the House. The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McJUNKIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. MARGARETTA S. MEADE.

Mr. McJUNKIN also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2212) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaretta S. Meade, widow of Major-General George G. Meade; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. McJUNKIN. I ask that that bill be acted on now.

Mr. MYERS. I presented a bill granting a pension to Mrs. Meade, widow of Major-General George G. Meade, and I do not desire that bill to be acted upon now. If no more than the pension allowed in this bill can be given to the widow of General Meade, I wish at the proper time to withdraw the request for a pension. I desire that the bill may go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and I shall there propose to insert a larger sum.

Mr. COBURN. What is the sum in the bill?

Mr. MYERS. Fifty dollars.

The SPEAKER. The bill can be amended in the House, if it is considered in the House.

Mr. MYERS. I should be better prepared to discuss the matter in committee. But if the Committee on Invalid Pensions is unanimously in favor of only fifty dollars a month, perhaps I should meet their opposition at this time. I wish to know if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McJUNKIN] is authorized in any way by the committee to support a larger sum.

Mr. McJUNKIN. I would admit my colleague's amendment to the bill.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, that I may be heard before them.

Mr. RUSK. For what reason does the gentleman desire to have the bill recommitted?

Mr. MYERS. I am willing that the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension law, the name of Mrs. Margaretta S. Meade, widow of Major-General George G. Meade, of the United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of fifty dollars per month from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I do not think that this morning I should be able to get the larger amount which I desire adopted, on behalf of the family, as well as, I think, in accordance with what would be the wishes of the whole people of the United States.

Mr. COBURN. If this bill is to be recommitted, I will move to reconsider the vote by which the bill granting a pension to Mrs. Canby was passed, that it may also be recommitted.

MRS. LOUISA H. CANBY.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the pending bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. And the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] moves to reconsider the vote whereby the House passed the bill granting a pension to the widow of General Canby, with a view to its being sent to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. RUSK. Before these bills are recommitted I would like to have instructions from the House whether they desire the Committee on Invalid Pensions to increase the pensions granted by the bills, as reported, to these applicants.

Mr. COBURN. I would prefer that the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RUSK. The committee are unanimous in regard to all of these cases. There are but four of this character, requiring the highest grade of pension, to which the committee have agreed. If it is thought proper to increase the amount, it would be well for the House to so instruct the committee. I will therefore ask that the committee may be instructed by a vote of the House on this subject; otherwise we will not know whether to reverse our action or not.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest that some gentleman had better name an amount which he thinks will be commensurate with the services of the officer.

Mr. COBURN. I will move to instruct the committee to report a bill fixing the pension of Mrs. Canby at $100 per month. Upon that I wish to say only this. The duty which General Canby performed in the Modoc war was one of a very peculiar character; not the ordinary duty of an officer or soldier, but something more. Upon that occasion he represented the entire Government—not only the War Department, but the Department of the Interior. He went out contrary to his own judgment to make these negotiations, fully aware of the danger of the critical duty he was performing; and there is no parallel instance in the history of this country with that of General Canby, or indeed in history. In his conduct, his responsibility, his faithful discharge of perilous duty, and his death, he stands alone. He acted under the authority of the Interior Department as well as of the War Department, and contrary to his better judgment as an officer of the Army. His life was lost no doubt because of his earnest, honest, and most honorable effort to carry out what has been properly termed the peace policy of the Government in relation to the Indians. What he did he did in the interest of humanity and mercy, and outside of his ordinary duty as an officer clothed with military power to compel obedience by force. And in losing his life for the Government, for the peace of the country, and for what most of us conceive to be a great and wise policy, his widow, who is poor, who during his life regularly expended in charities the little surplus he may have had, should now receive something more than the ordinary pension accorded to widows of officers. Her case is not one of a widow whose husband died after a long and faithful service, or even of one who had been slain on the field of battle in the line of duty, but one discharging a greater, more onerous, more dangerous, and more delicate duty.

Mr. MYERS. I do not need to speak before this House of the services of General Meade, nor to refer to him as the hero of the battle of Gettysburgh.

Mr. MAYNARD. Allow me to conclude what I have to say on this subject.

Mr. MYERS. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. The case of the widow of General Canby is the one before the House. After we have disposed of that, then we can take up the case of the widow of General Meade.

What I was about to remark was this: when I asked the consent of the House to act upon the bill for the relief of Mrs. Canby it was without any knowledge of the amount of pension fixed by the committee. I wished we should act upon it upon the principle of bis dat qui cito dat. I see no reason why we should commit this bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The House has the whole subject now before it, and if it agree with what has been said by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] and I most certainly do, then, having by unanimous consent reconsidered our action in passing the bill, all that is necessary is to increase the pension from fifty dollars a month to $100 a month. If the House are willing to adopt that amendment, as I have no doubt it is, it can be passed in that shape here and now. I trust that direction will be followed, and then we can take up the case of Mrs. Meade.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regards the bill for the relief of Mrs. Canby as the one now pending, and it is open to amendment.

Mr. COBURN. I move to amend the bill so as to increase the pension to $100 per month.

Mr. SHANKS. I wish simply to make a correction in regard to a matter of fact in connection with a statement made by my colleague, [Mr. COBURN.] General Canby is entitled to all the commendation that has been or can be given by any one here. I do not oppose this measure for the relief of his widow; but General Canby was not acting at that time under the Interior Department. That Department did not in any particular control him; but, upon the contrary, its agents and officers sent out there were, by letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in repeated words, ordered to obey General Canby, and not to interfere with the military at all. General Canby, however, was there in the discharge of his duties as his judgment dictated, and I believe all should be done for his widow that can be done; for the worth of the officer justifies all that can be done. But justice to the facts of history, to the truth of the record, to the peace policy of the Government, requires me to say that it is not correct that General Canby was controlled in any way except by military authority and his own judgment as a military officer.

Mr. COBURN. I have in my possession the orders and telegrams not only from the War Department, but from the Interior Department, in connection with this whole unfortunate matter. General Canby had intrusted to him not only the orders of the War Department, but the entire discretion of the Interior Department, the entire management of what has been termed the peace policy in that matter. I have not said that he was trammeled by any orders from the Department of the Interior, but I do say that he had lodged in him in managing that matter the entire discretion of the Government; that the duty he performed was over and above and outside of any duty that he was required to perform as a military man. In that view of the case his services were greater and his merit was more conspicuous than it otherwise would have been. He nobly took the whole responsibility reposed in hfm by every branch of the Government, and fell, at the post of duty, a victim to his devotion to the public welfare.

Mr. SHANKS. That is true

Mr. COBURN. That is why I say that the widow of this officer is more entitled to a pension than the widow of a soldier or officer who lost his life in the discharge of ordinary military duty.

Mr. SHANKS. But I insist that General Canby was not accountable to the Department here. The Department had submitted the whole matter to his hands; he was not controlled by the Department.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is unnecessary to say either to the House or the country that General Canby was a brave soldier, a Christian gentleman, a humane and good man. That fact has passed into the history of the country. The only question we now have to consider is whether the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] proposes anything more than is commensurate with the estimate in which the character and services of General Canby are held.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the question is put upon this proposition, I desire to say that this bill will be followed by one providing a pension for Mrs. McPherson, the mother of Major-General McPherson. I desire to say that I consider the latter case equally meritorious with this; and shall move a similar amendment if the pending amendment should prevail.

Mr. SCOFIELD. During the last Congress we voted to the widow of Admiral Farragut (the case having been considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs) a pension of $2,000 a year. I only remind the House of this fact.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, it is probably an ungracious office for me to interpose any obstacle to the adoption of the proposition now pending; yet it occurs to me that this is not precisely the way in which our pension lists should be increased. We have general classes of pensioners. I understand this to be a proposition to make an exceptional pension for the widow of General Canby. Now, sir, I have no doubt that the widow of General Canby is entitled to as large a pension as the widow of any other officer who has given his life in the service of his country. General Canby was a brave soldier. Even before he was sent to protect the interests of the United States against the Indians he had rendered most gallant service to the country. He on various occasions proved his patriotism by the highest achievements in the power of any man to accomplish; and his widow is entitled to the same degree of consideration here as the widow of any officer holding an equal rank in the Army.

I am not saying that $100 or $200 or $500 a month is too large a pension for the widow of an officer holding the position that General Canby held in the Army of the United States, and who lost his life in the service of his country. But I do say, Mr. Speaker, that the Congress of the United States ought to fix by law the pension applicable to any given rank in the service; and when an officer holding that rank loses his life, his widow should stand precisely on an equality with the widow of every other officer holding similar rank.

It would be a very invidious distinction to propose here that the widow of one private soldier should receive a pension of fifteen, twenty, or thirty dollars a month, while the widow of another private soldier should receive forty, fifty, or one hundred dollars a month. We hold that the life of one man is equally valuable with that of another when we come to estimate it here by dollars and cents in the granting of pensions. Upon this principle, for every disability of a certain class incurred by any private soldier, no matter whether he was especially distinguished for bravery or not, we vote a fixed rate of pension, which is given to every private soldier suffering similar disability. In the same way we should give to the widow of every officer the same pension that we grant to the widow of another officer of similar rank. Hence it occurs to me that it would be the wisest course to let this bill be recommitted, for this purpose if for no other: that a bill may be reported fixing the pension that shall be applicable to any particular rank in the service. Whatever the amount that may be fixed for any particular rank, whether fifty or seventy-five or one hundred dollars a month, let all pensioners in similar cases come in upon an equality.

It has been suggested here that the mother of General McPherson is entitled to consideration from this House. I agree to that; but I hold at the same time that all who may come in under our pension laws should be put upon the list for an amount graduated according to the rank in the service of the person on account of whom the pension is granted. If we establish such a rule, we do not need to consider the merits of each individual case. The widow of General Canby has lost her husband; but so has the widow of every soldier who gave his life in the service of the country. Whether that service was rendered on the plains and he fell by the arrows or bullets of the Indians, or was rendered in the southern country during the late rebellion, or wherever it was rendered, the widow has lost her husband, and is entitled to the pension which should be provided for the rank her husband held at the time in the Army. It seems to me the Committee on Invalid Pensions is abundantly able to consider what pension is to be granted to each grade of rank.

Mr. RUSK. I wish to say for the benefit of the gentleman that the Committee on Invalid Pensions have carefully considered the matter, and have agreed to report a bill granting a pension of fifty dollars in each of these four cases. They have placed these four now being considered on that list, granting the highest pension. If the pension in these cases be raised from fifty to one hundred dollars, there will not only be hundreds but thousands of widows whose pensions will also have to be raised. Therefore if the House recommits this bill with instructions to raise this pension, we will feel compelled to report to the House a general bill raising all the pensions of the same grade.

Mr. COBURN. I ask now that the testimony of General Sherman before the Committee on Military Affairs in relation to the status of General Canby in this affair with the Modoc Indians be read, and also the orders of General Sherman and the telegram of Mr. Delano, Secretary of the Interior.

The Clerk read as follows:

General SHERMAN. General Canby was one of those singularly cautious, conscientious men who are not so common now as they used to be. He looked upon it as his duty to fulfill the orders, and the spirit of the orders, coming to him from the highest, or from any superior authority. General Schofield was in supreme command of the Pacific division, embracing California and Oregon, but he had gone, for the benefit of his health, to the Sandwich Islands, leaving General Canby in Oregon, temporarily in command of the whole division of the Pacific. He made himself familiar, as rapidly as he could, with the interests of all parts. About this time this Modoc matter, on the borders of Oregon and California, had begun to grow into a serious matter; telegrams came to Washington, and, instead of attacking these Indians in position, orders went out, "Do not attack; wait awhile, and give the peace commissioners a chance to confer with the Indians, and to reason with them, and to remonstrate with them." And commissioners were sent all the way from Washington out there. General Canby was simply kept advised not to attempt anything, but to keep the statu quo until these gentlemen could have time to arrange matters. But little personal difficulties grew up among these commissioners; one wanted one thing, and another wanted another thing, and they could not exactly agree. Mr. Delano, I think, made a personal request that General Canby should go down there from Portland in person, resting more in the faith of his character than in his office. He was very well known here in Washington. He went down there; and, as he understood, not so much as the commander of the troops or of the military division of the Pacific, but as General Canby, to assist in untying this ugly knot. I have no doubt at all that, when General Canby consented to go into Captain Jack's camp that fatal day, he knew that he was doing an imprudent military thing—not his duty as an officer, but out of regard for the peace commissioners—feeling that, possibly, Captain Jack did mean to act in good faith, and by a little persuasion would yield to their representations and would go back as required to his place on the Klamath reservation. In other words, he surrendered his character as a military commander, and put himself in the power of Captain Jack and his little knot of Modocs as a peace commissioner.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., March 6, 1873.

All parties here have absolute faith in you, but mistrust the commissioners. If that Modoc affair can be terminated peacefully by you, it will be accepted by the Secretary of the Interior as well as the President. Answer me immediately, and advise the names of one or two good men with whom you can act, and they will receive the necessary authority; or if you can effect the surrender to you of the hostile Modocs, do it and remove them under guard to some safe place, assured that the Government will deal by them liberally and fairly.

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

General E. R. S. CANBY,
Commanding, Fairchild's Ranch, California, Modoc Country.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., March 22, 1873.

SIR: Your communication of this date, inclosing a telegram from General Canby dated the 16th instant, is received.

I have so much confidence in the wisdom, discretion, and correct purposes of General Canby, in regard to the execution, as far as possible, of the President's policy and the Department's wish to preserve peace and prevent further bloodshed with the Modocs, that I deem it my duty to authorize General Canby to remove from the present commission appointed by this Department any member whom he thinks unfit or improper, and appoint in his place such person as in his judgment should be appointed; always expecting him to inform this Department, through the War Department or otherwise, immediately on his action. You will please inform General Canby of the substance of this letter, provided you are willing to allow him to use the discretion and exercise the powers which are hereby conferred upon him with your approbation.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. DELANO, Secretary.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. COBURN.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 69; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COBURN and Mr. RUSK were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 103.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I would like to inquire what necessity there is for the passage of this bill. Cannot this lady obtain a pension under existing pension laws?

Mr. RUSK. That has been already explained to the House, as the gentleman would know if he had listened to the debate which has taken place. The law grants her a pension of thirty dollars a month, but the committee have raised the pension to fifty dollars a month in the pending four cases. The motion pending was to raise that pension, in the case of Mrs. Canby, to $100 a month. That amendment has been voted down. The committee has recommended the highest pension granted in like cases.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I cannot see any necessity for such legislation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCJUNKIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. MARGARETTA S. MEADE.

The SPEAKER. The next bill agreed to be considered in the House is the bill (H. R. No. 2212) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaretta S. Meade, widow of Major-General George G. Meade.

Mr. MYERS. I move to amend by striking out "fifty" and inserting "one hundred," so that the pension shall be $100 per month. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. YOUNG] desires to say a few words, and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I hope this bill will pass. General Meade has served the Government for over thirty years, and I may say with honor to himself and credit to the country. From the year 1835 he served with distinction in the Corps of Engineers up to the beginning of the late war. His history is too well known in that war to be commented on by me now. But no man who did not serve in the army in which I had the honor to serve during the desperate campaign of Gettysburgh can appreciate the vigor and ability with which he handled his army on that great occasion, and during that entire campaign. He took command of the Army of the Potomac when it was partially demoralized by many defeats, and by his energy, courage, and ability brought it to that state of efficiency which enabled it to achieve a victory to which you probably owe the safety of your capital and the perpetuation of your Union.

I may, sir, be prompted in the utterance of these sentiments partially from feelings of gratitude to the great soldier. For perhaps if it had not been for his kindness, justice, and magnanimity, I would not be a member of this House to-day. He signed my first certificate of election, as military governor of Georgia, and by his letters of recommendation I was enabled to obtain my seat in the Fortieth Congress in 1868, and without those letters I believe I should have been rejected. I feel grateful to General Meade for his kindness to me then, and I honor his memory for the many noble deeds of his life. During his many years of service to the Government he handled and disbursed millions of dollars of the public money; and yet he died without property. He has left an example which it would be well for many of the public officers of the present day to emulate. He has served the Government long and faithfully; let the Government take care of his widow and orphans.

Mr. MYERS. Before calling for a vote on my amendment I desire to make a brief statement. A grateful country can never pay too much honor to the memory of those who have been pre-eminent in its service; and no man was more distinguished in his sphere of duty, and in what he accomplished for the country, than Major-General George G. Meade. His life was one in which honor, bravery, purity, and great simplicity of character formed the chief elements. He lived honored, and died respected by all who had ever known him; but beyond this, his services will always live in the hearts of the American people, who would gladly see their national representatives render a substantial tribute to those he loved. Gettysburgh was the crowning glory of his career. In that great event he was the commanding and central figure. I need not occupy the time of the House by referring more fully to an epoch or services so memorable.

His case is a remarkable one. Thousands of such cases cannot follow this, as the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions seems to fear. When you find thousands of such men as General George G. Meade, I will be ready to vote for their widows and families just so many pensions.

Neither will the common soldier nor his family regret that to one of his great commanders this measure of gratitude and justice is given. We gladly give pensions to the families of private soldiers and sailors. Day by day we remember them and prove that the country is grateful for their services. Let the many bills on our table which will pass this very day answer those who interpose these just claims as an objection to a case like this. Let us in this instance do a small part at least of what is just. We granted the widow of Admiral Farragut a pension of $2,000 a year; and I desired that as much should be given to the widow of General Meade; but in view of the opposition on this floor, and particularly in the Senate, to the grant of large pensions in other distinguished cases, my proposition now is to amend the bill by making the sum for Mrs. Meade merely $100 per month. The gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. YOUNG,] who was a leader in the opposing armies, lends his voice to my request. Let us do this act gracefully, and, I hope, unanimously.

The question being put on the amendment proposed by Mr. MYERS, there were—ayes 41, noes not counted.

Mr. MYERS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAGE. I ask that the bill may again be reported.

The SPEAKER. The bill proposes to give a pension of fifty dollars a month to the widow of Major-General Meade. The amendment proposes to give $100 a month.

The question being put on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 12; not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the amendment was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCJUNKIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

Mr. TYNER. The morning hour having expired, I desire to make a statement to the House. I entered a motion this morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal, to reconsider the vote by which the House refused yesterday to pass the bill H. R. No. 825. After thinking the matter over more fully, and taking some counsel with friends on the subject, I have concluded to withdraw that motion for reconsideration, and give notice to the House that I will, on Monday next, if I can obtain the recognition of the Chair, introduce a bill in regard to the free circulation of weekly newspapers, and press it to a passage under a motion to suspend the rules.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RUSK. There are still two bills in the hands of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCJUNKIN] of the same class and the same merit as the two which have just been passed by the House. I ask that, although the morning hour has expired, these bills may now be considered by the House.

There was no objection.

MRS. CYNTHIA M'PHERSON.

Mr. MCJUNKIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2213) granting a pension to Mrs. Cynthia McPherson, mother of the late General James B. McPherson; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Cynthia McPherson, mother of James B. McPherson, late major-general United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of fifty dollars per month from and after the passage of the act.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. RUSK. There is no report accompanying the bill. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] who represents the district in which this lady resides, desires to make a statement.

Mr. FOSTER. It is now nearly ten years since General James B. McPherson was shot dead in front of Atlanta while in command of the Army of the Tennessee, and in the immediate presence of the honorable gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. RUSK,] then a general in command of a brigade under General McPherson, and now the honored chairman of the Committee on Pensions.

General McPherson's mother has, all these ten years, refused to apply for a pension, although assured that her application either to Congress or the Pension Department would be favorably acted upon. By daily toil and strict economy, with the help of relations, she has thus far been enabled to secure a comfortable living. And now, at the age of sixty-nine, she petitions Congress for relief. The Committee on Pensions have unanimously agreed upon the bill now before us, fixing the sum at fifty dollars per month, the amount fixed by precedent in cases of distinguished merit.

I trust that this House, remembering, as they must, the singular purity of General McPherson's character, his marked ability and brilliant achievements as a soldier, ranking as they do with our most honored chieftains, will especially honor the name of McPherson by passing this bill.

Mr. Speaker, this is the only opportunity that Congress will have to honor his great name. In thus contributing to the comfort of his aged mother we honor him, and in honoring him we but honor ourselves.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCJUNKIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. FRANCES C. ELLIOTT.

Mr. MCJUNKIN also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 64) restoring the pension of Mrs. Frances C. Elliott, widow of Commodore Jesse D. Elliott, late of the United States Navy.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The preamble of the bill states that by the third section of the act of July, 1866, and the third section of the act of July 27, 1868, the pension of Frances C. Elliott, widow of Commodore Jesse D. Elliott, was reduced from fifty dollars per month to thirty dollars per month, which reduction commenced on the 4th day of September, 1869.

The bill provides that the said Frances C. Elliott shall be allowed and paid out of the Treasury of the United States, from moneys not otherwise appropriated, a pension at the rate of fifty dollars per month, commencing on the 4th day of September, 1869; provided that the amount of pension received by her from the 4th day of September, 1869, shall be deducted therefrom.

Mr. TODD. I ask that that bill may be considered in the House at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will ask that the question of order upon it be reserved until the report is read.

The SPEAKER. There is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me there should be a report; otherwise I think the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. TODD. If the House will allow me, I will state in a few minutes the facts in this case. This lady, Mrs. Frances C. Elliott, is the widow of Commodore Jesse D. Elliott, late of the United States Navy. He was a gallant officer in that Navy, and rendered distinguished services at the battle of Lake Erie, and for a number of years was employed in important service by the Government. He died about 1850, and this lady was granted a pension of fifty dollars a month. She enjoyed that pension until the passage of the acts of 1866 and 1868 disrating pensions from fifty to thirty dollars per month; and since that time she has been paid a pension at the rate of thirty dollars per month. She is now eighty-three years of age, blind, in indigent circumstances, and dependent entirely upon her pension for her support. She is really in necessitous circumstances. As her advanced age renders it very improbable that she will long survive, it would be a generous act on the part of a liberal Government to make provision for her old age, which cannot be long extended. I trust that, under these circumstances, the House will pass this bill, and will give this old lady, the widow of a meritorious officer, something that will smooth the way of her declining years.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that this lady now receives a pension of thirty dollars per month, having formerly received a pension of fifty dollars per month. As the uniform practice has been to restore the pensions which were reduced by the acts of 1866 and 1868, I see no reason why the same rule should not apply to this particular case. I therefore will not press the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. Was there any special cause for reduction of pension in this case?

Mr. TODD. Nothing except the principle of a general law reducing pensions.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCJUNKIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALFRED BOLDER.

Mr. MCJUNKIN also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 551) granting a pension to Alfred Bolder; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

AUGUSTUS L. YAEGER.

Mr. MCJUNKIN also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1791) granting a pension to Augustus L. Yaeger; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

MARGARET E. WEST.

Mr. MCJUNKIN also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 62) for the relief of Margaret E. West; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

JOSIAH BRINARD.

Mr. MCJUNKIN also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 60) granting a pension to Josiah Brinard; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

ANN HUMPHREYS.

Mr. MCJUNKIN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2214) granting a pension to Ann Humphreys, of Philadelphia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY C. SMITH.

Mr. HOWE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (S. No. 317) for the relief of Henry C. Smith, of Indianapolis, Indiana; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RUSK. I ask that the morning hour may be allowed to run until the Committee on Invalid Pensions have completed their reports.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will receive reports from that committee of bills to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ALMON P. GRAVES.

Mr. WALLACE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 20) granting a pension to Almon P. Graves; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ELIZABETH BRADY.

Mr. WALLACE also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2215) granting a pension to Elizabeth Brady; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ELIZABETH HACKELMAN.

Mr. SMALL, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1832) granting a pension to Elizabeth Hackelman; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

CORNELIA A. WASHBURN.

Mr. SMALL also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2216) granting a pension to Cornelia A. Washburn; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

EDGAR L. SPENCER.

Mr. SMALL also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 256) for the relief of Edgar L. Spencer; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

HENRY BRUCKNER.

Mr. MARTIN, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2217) granting a pension to Henry Bruckner, a private of Company F, Fifty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

SARAH SOMERVILLE.

Mr. MARTIN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2218) granting a pension to Sarah Somerville, widow of Alexander S. Somerville, late deputy provost-marshal eleventh district of Illinois; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

PATRICK HICKEY.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2219) granting a pension to Patrick Hickey; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ANDREW J. BALDWIN.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2220) granting a pension to Andrew J. Baldwin; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

MARY B. TRIPLETT.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2221) granting a pension to Mary B. Triplett, guardian of the minor heirs of John A. Tomlinson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

HUGH WALLACE.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (S. No. 366) granting a pension to Hugh Wallace; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

WILLIAM E. PRINCE.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. KASSON. Pending that motion, the gentleman from Illinois allows me to call attention to a bill which is on the Speaker's table, House bill No. 1225, granting a pension to William E. Prince, of Iowa. This bill has been passed by the Senate with an amendment, striking out the clause which made the pension retroactive, so that the pension under the amended bill will take effect from the date of its passage. I ask unanimous consent that that amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

There being no objection, the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CROCKER indefinitely, on account of illness; to Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, and Mr. ROBBINS, for one week; to Mr. DANFORD for ten days from next Tuesday; to Mr. SMALL for two weeks; to Mr. HAGANS for ten days; and to Mr. WELLS for eight days.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the Committee on Claims the papers in the case of Lucien V. Wadsworth, no adverse report having been made.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, for use in the Senate, papers in the case of Captain Samuel Adams, asking compensation for services rendered in making explorations on the Upper Colorado River.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal of papers in the case of Henry M. Harmon, no adverse report having been made.

On motion of Mr. STOWELL, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of J. M. Wood.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had passed bills of the House of the following titles, without amendment:

An act (H. R. No. 253) for the relief of Thomas Hillhouse, treasurer of the United States in the city of New York;

An act (H. R. No. 451) extending the time for the completion of the Green Bay, Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal, in the State of Wisconsin;

An act (H. R. No. 1284) authorizing the chief clerk of the War Department to sign requisitions during the temporary absence of the Secretary of War; and

An act (H. R. No. 2201) to render available certain unexpended balances of appropriation.

It further announced that the Senate had adopted a resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, that seventy-five hundred additional copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1873 be printed for the use of the Institution, provided that the aggregate number of pages of said report shall not exceed four hundred and fifty, and that there shall be no illustrations except those furnished by the Smithsonian Institution.

It further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 2191) in relation to the customs duties on imported fruits.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, (Mr. ORTH in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Private Calendar.

FOSTER A. HIXSON.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole House was last in session, it had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 1775) for the relief of Foster A. Hixson, late paymaster in the United States Army, which was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT.] The pending question was on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that the enacting clause of the bill be stricken out.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be again read.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to inquire of the Chairman whether this is not objection day, and whether anything else is in order but to go over the Calendar and lay aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that they do pass, only such bills as there shall be no objection to.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. The bill for the relief of Foster A. Hixson was under consideration when the Committee of the Whole House was in session on Saturday last, and I submit it must be disposed of before we can go to any other business.

Mr. MAYNARD. That will come up as unfinished business when we go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar on any private-bill day which is not objection day.

The CHAIRMAN. The point raised by the gentleman from Tennessee, the Chair holds to be well taken

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that this comes up as unfinished business, and we must dispose of it before we go to anything else. Then, as a fact, no objection has been made to this bill, but there is pending only a motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. In order to settle the question, the Chair will have the rule read controlling proceedings in committee on objection day.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the first and fourth Friday and Saturday of each month the Calendar of Private Bills shall be called over, (the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House commencing the call where he left off the previous day;) and the bills to the passage of which no objection shall then be made shall be first considered and disposed of. But when a bill is again reached, after having been once objected to, the committee shall consider and dispose of the same, unless it shall again be objected to by at least five members. (Rule 129.) [Sometimes the House, under a suspension of the rules, directs that other days than the above be treated as objection days.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I hold, notwithstanding that rule, this bill would still be under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that this bill does not come up on objection day, and the committee will now proceed with the consideration of the Private Calendar for objections.

GEORGE YOUNT.

The first business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1776) for the relief of George Yount, late second lieutenant Company I, Third Missouri Volunteer Infantry.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Paymaster-General of the Army is authorized and directed to pay to George Yount, late a second lieutenant of Company I, Third Missouri Volunteer Infantry, out of any money appropriated, or which may hereafter be appropriated for the pay of the Army, a sum equal to the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant of infantry, from the 1st day of September, 1863, to the 7th day of March, 1864, deducting whatever pay he may have received for that period.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the report in that case be read.

It appears from the report, which was read, that George L. Yount was duly commissioned as second lieutenant Third Missouri Volunteers, 24th March, 1863, and while making an assault upon the enemy's works at Vicksburgh, Mississippi, was severely wounded so as to disable him to perform duty; that he was not mustered as such second lieutenant until the 7th day of March, 1864, but that a vacancy existed on the 1st day of September, 1863, into which he could have been mustered but for the wound from which he was suffering.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES C. LIVINGSTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 725) for the relief of James C. Livingston, late a private in Company E, Third Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry.

The bill, which was read, provides that James C. Livingston, late a private in Company E, Third Iowa Regiment of Volunteer Infantry, shall be entitled to an honorable discharge from the service of the United States, to date July 22, 1865, the date of the final muster of his regiment, and shall be entitled to his back pay and bounty, and shall be restored to all homestead and other rights as fully and completely as though he had been honorably mustered out of said service with his regiment, provided that the claim for bounty and back pay of the said James C. Livingston shall be adjusted and paid without reference to the limitations contained in any law heretofore enacted for the filing of such claims in the Treasury Department.

Mr. DONNAN. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to have read the report in this case.

It appears from the report, which was read, that this claimant was mustered into the United States service June 8, 1861, for a term of three years; re-enlisted as a veteran January 4, 1864, and was transferred to Company A, Second Iowa Veteran Volunteers, and continued to serve until June 25, 1865, a term upward of four years. It further appears from his own affidavit, corroborated by a sworn statement of his captain, that on the 25th of June, 1865, he received a letter from his father that his (soldier's) mother was lying at the point of death, and asking him to come home; that he applied for furlough, but was denied; that he then went home without permission, was home about one week, attended the death and burial of his mother, and then immediately returned to his command at Louisville, Kentucky, on the very day his company were mustered for discharge; that his captain applied for his honorable discharge, which was refused by the mustering officer. The soldier swears he never attempted nor intended to desert; and his captain gives him the honorable name of a good, true, faithful soldier, with this single exception.

A bill for his relief passed the House of the last Congress, probably failing for want of time for consideration in the Senate.

The committee report the bill again to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALEXANDER BURTCH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1313) for the relief of Alexander Burtch.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Adjutant-General of the Army is thereby authorized and directed to change the recordo f desertion against Alexander Burtch, late veteran soldier of Company H, First Indiana Heavy Artillery, formerly Twenty-first Indiana Infantry Volunteers, and substitute therefor, "Absent from September 25, 1865." And the said Alexander Burtch shall be allowed and paid the amount remaining due and accrued up to the time of his absence aforesaid, but shall not be entitled to any bounty subsequently granted by the United States.

It appears from the report, which was read, that the claimant was enlisted as a soldier in Company H, Twenty-first Indiana Volunteers, afterward known as the Indiana Heavy Artillery, on the 6th day of July, 1861, and re-enlisted as a veteran on the 31st day of December, 1863, and served until the 25th day of September, 1865.

On the day last above named, according to his own affidavit, he left his command without due authority and returned to Watertown, Park County, Indiana; he was thereupon entered on the roll as a deserter, and his application for an honorable discharge has been refused.

He avers that he left his command under no concealment, but in the day-time, and with the full knowledge of his captain and colonel, and without any intention of defrauding the Government of his services, and believing that he fulfilled his contract with the Government.

He further states that the whereabouts of his captain, W. P. Widdewer, is unknown to him, and that the colonel, Benjamin F. Hays, is now deceased.

Major James W. Conway and Captain J. T. Campbell, both of the same regiment, give him the character of a good and efficient and faithful soldier, and guilty of no prior misconduct.

He is also well vouched for by prominent citizens where he has resided since the close of the war.

He only asks for the pay accrued up to the date of his absence, with loss of claim for any bounty subsequently granted, and that the record of desertion be changed to "Absent from September 25, 1865."

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MATTHEW WOODRUFF.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1777) for the relief of Matthew Woodruff, of Clarke County, Missouri, ate first sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, from the charge of desertion, and to grant him an honorable discharge from the service, &c.

Mr. DONNAN. The Senate has passed a bill equivalent in its terms to this House bill, and I desire to offer it as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. That is an objection, and the bill goes over. The question is on a House bill, and a motion to amend is an objection to the bill.

Mr. DONNAN. I withdraw the objection.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the proper officers of the War Department to remove the charge of desertion marked against Matthew Woodruff, late first sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and to issue to him an honorable discharge from the military service of the United States, of the same date as the final muster out of that regiment; and the said Woodruff shall be entitled to all his rights as to pay and bounty, deducting pay for the time of his absence from his command, as though he had been honorably mustered out of service with his regiment. The bill further provides that any claims for such pay and bounty shall be adjusted without reference to any limitations heretofore enacted for the filing of such claims in the Treasury Department.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1300) for the relief of Matthew Woodruff, late a sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

The evidence plainly establishes the following facts: That claimant was enlisted into the United States military service June 15, 1861; that he served as first sergeant Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry; that he re-enlisted as a veteran, served honestly, faithfully, and gallantly all through the war, and was yet retained in the service on the 2d day of April, 1866, several months after the surrender of the rebel armies. On this last date he was notified of the death of his only brother, and urged to come home and minister to the wants of a father and sister, invalid and dependent upon the charity of the community. He tried to procure a furlough, but failed, when he absented himself without proper authority; went home for a few days, and was in the act of returning, when he met his command proceeding to Saint Louis, Missouri, for final discharge, he having been entered upon the muster-out roll as a deserter. Many officers of the regiment, from the lieutenant-colonel down, join in giving him the name of a gallant, true soldier; say that his absence was evidently intended to be only temporary, and unite in the petition for his full relief.

The committee therefore report the accompanying substitute for the bill referred, giving this soldier full pay (less his time of absence) and bounty, and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside, to be favorably reported to the House.

SIMEON J. THOMPSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 133) for the relief of Simeon J. Thompson, late an acting second lieutenant of Company B, Seventy-ninth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers.

Mr. DONNAN. The committee have made an adverse report on that bill.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do not pass.

SUPPLIES TO KANSAS INDIANS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1331) for the relief of Joab Spencer and James R. Mead, for supplies furnished the Kansas tribe of Indians.

The bill was read. It authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Interior to pay, or cause to be paid, to Joab Spencer and James R. Mead, late the firm of Spencer & Mead, the sum of $7,509.83, and interest on said sum at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 6th day of August, 1867, until paid, out of any money now due and owing, or that may at any time hereafter become due and owing, the Kansas tribe of Indians, in the State of Kansas, from the proceeds arising from the sale of lands owned by said tribe of Indians in said State of Kansas, in full compensation for the goods and provisions furnished said Indians by said Spencer & Mead during the years 1866 and 1867.

Mr. LOWE. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1331) for the relief of Joab Spencer and James R. Mead, for supplies furnished the Kansas tribe of Indians, respectfully submit the following report:

Joab Spencer and James R. Mead were authorized Indian traders with the Kansas Indians, and in 1866 and 1867 furnished to the Indians of the tribe the provisions and goods for which payment is sought. An itemized and verified account of the articles accompanies the claim and proofs. It appears that the articles were furnished in the years 1866 and 1867; that the annual hunt of the tribe in the fall of 1866 was entirely unsuccessful, owing principally to the hostility of Cheyenne Indians, and the tribe were compelled to resort to unusual purchases which could not be met by their ordinary annuities. The payment of the claim in the sum of $7,509.83, with interest, is asked for by the Indians in a petition of its chiefs and head-men. E. S. Stover, the agent of the tribe, in a report to Thomas Murphy, superintendent of Indian affairs, of November 15, 1867, speaking of the accounts, says: "I have also examined and am satisfied of their correctness, and that they should be paid. The Indians also acknowledge the correctness of the claim, and request the Government to pay it out of any moneys except their regular annuities."

Thomas Murphy, superintendent of Indian affairs, in a communication to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, says: "I believe the account of Spencer & Mead to be correct and just, * * * and respectfully refer the matter to the Department, with the recommendation that the account be paid out of any funds applicable for that purpose."

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in a report upon the case, says: "From the papers presented in the claim I am satisfied that the articles named in the account were actually furnished, and that the claimants, Messrs. Spencer & Mead, have a just claim for the amount thereof, and should be paid."

The committee are of the opinion that the correctness and justice of the account are fully established by unquestionable proofs, and that payment should be made as provided in the bill. It appears that the lands in Kansas reserved for these Indians, being over one hundred and seventeen thousand acres, are being sold for their benefit under an act of Congress of 1872, from which an ample fund will be derived for the subsistence and civilization of these Indians, and to pay all their obligations; and the effect of this bill will be to enable payment to be made of this claim out of the funds of the Indians, and as requested by themselves.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JAMES L. JOHNSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1924) for the relief of James L. Johnson, surviving partner of Beck & Johnson, authorizing payment for Indian depredations.

Mr. COMINGO. I ask that the bill be passed over for the present.

The bill was passed over.

JAMES PRESTON BECK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1925) for the relief of James Preston Beck, administrator of Preston Beck, jr., deceased, authorizing payment for Indian depredations.

Mr. COMINGO. I ask that that bill also be passed over for the present.

The bill was passed over.

SILOMA DECK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 980) for the relief of Siloma Deck.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the loss sustained by Mrs. Siloma Deck, in the year 1862, by depredations committed by the Sioux Indians in Minnesota; and he is thereby authorized to pay, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such a sum as he shall think right and proper, not exceeding the sum of $1,095.37; which settlement shall be in full for all claims arising from such depredations.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 980) for the relief of Siloma Deck, having considered the same, make the following report:

The claimant is the widow of Philip H. Deck, late a citizen of Meeker County, Minnesota, who was killed by the Sioux Indians in the massacre of 1862. At the time of the Indian outbreak she was living with her husband and family at Manahah, Minnesota, who were possessed of a farm, dwelling-house, furniture, and farm products. On account of the outbreak the family were compelled to remove suddenly to Forest City, and in attempting to return to their home, to save the property, the husband was killed, and the property was taken and destroyed by the Sioux Indians.

The claimant was then aided to go to the State of New York, whence she returned to her home in Minnesota in 1865. In the mean time commissioners had been appointed and appropriations made by the General Government to audit and settle claims of citizens of Minnesota on account of Indian depredations in that massacre, and the accounts were closed. The claimant being of German birth and education, and not conversant with the English tongue, was wholly ignorant of the necessity of presenting her claim, and was therefore left unprovided for.

As to the amount, ownership, and loss of the property by the claimant under these circumstances, the facts have been attested by various witnesses, the immediate neighbors of the claimant, whose credibility is vouched for by the county officers of Meeker County, the receiver and register of the land office, and the representative in the State Legislature, as also by a member of the committee.

A similar bill to the present was considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, and reported favorably (No. 1246) in the Forty-second Congress, recommending an appropriation of $1,095.37 for the relief of the claimant. The committee have concurred in the propriety of recommending that sum, though the claimant has presented her evidence under oath that her losses amounted to $1,927.46. The main facts and the merits of the case are not doubted. It is admitted to be one of extreme hardship, and the claimant altogether worthy of relief. Since her return to her home she has kept her premises by her personal toil, but has been unable to make improvements, while others have received indemnity from the Government. It does not seem, therefore, to be injudicious or wasteful to recommend the limited relief provided for in this bill.

The committee report it back and recommend its passage.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have no objection to this bill being considered if debate is in order; but I do not wish it to be reported without debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

DAVID BRADEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 353) for the relief of David Braden.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to David Braden, late captain and assistant adjutant-general of volunteers, for commutation of quarters and fuel and three months' extra pay under the act of March 3, 1865, the sum of $1,058, out of any money in the Treasury appropriated or to be appropriated for the pay of the Army of the United States.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

PAT. O. HAWES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1934) for the relief of Pat. O. Hawes.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Paymaster-General to pay Pat. O. Hawes, late second lieutenant in the Forty-fifth Kentucky Regiment of Volunteer Infantry, United States Army, the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry, from the 25th day of September, 1863, until the 23d day of January, 1864.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Pat. O. Hawes, late second lieutenant Forty-fifth Regiment Kentucky Infantry, beg leave to report as follows:

On the 26th of August, 1863, Lieutenant Pat. O. Hawes was captain of Company F, Fourteenth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and resigned for the purpose of assisting in recruiting and organizing the Forty-fifth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and with a view of securing the majority of said regiment. On the 6th of September, 1863, he was commissioned; mustered into the United States service with the rank of second lieutenant in said Forty-fifth Regiment, to date from the 25th of September; said muster was made September 30.

He was mustered into the service for one year, unless sooner discharged. It appears that after the regiment was full, the colonel of it refused to assign Lieutenant Hawes to a company, or give him any appointment in the regiment, and thus he became a supernumerary. On the 6th of November, 1863, Lieutenant Hawes tendered his resignation, which was finally accepted, and muster-in canceled on January 23, 1864. From all the evidence before the committee, it is clear that Lieutenant Hawes entered the service in good faith, performed military duty pertaining to the organization of his regiment until he was relieved, and it is, therefore, the opinion of the committee that he is entitled to relief, and report the accompanying amended bill.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM J. SCOTT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1935) for the relief of William J. Scott, late aid-de-camp on the staff of General Spears.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William J. Scott the pay and emoluments of an aid-de-camp with the rank of first lieutenant, from the 21st day of May, 1862, to the 30th day of October, 1862, deducting what pay, if any, he may have received as an aid-de-camp on the staff of Brigadier-General James G. Spears.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of William J. Scott, late a first lieutenant and aid-de-camp on the staff of Brigadier-General Spears, report favorably as follows, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

William J. Scott was appointed aid-de-camp on the staff of Brigadier-General Spears by the following order:

[Special Orders, No. 71.]

HEADQUARTERS TWENTY-FIFTH BRIGADE, ARMY OF THE OHIO,
Camp Pine-Knot, May 21, 1862.

The general commanding hereby appoints William J. Scott aid-de-camp on his staff in place of William R. Tracy, resigned.

By order of Brigadier-General Spears.

D. C. TREWHITT,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

It is clearly shown by the affidavit of the officers who served with him, and by the statement of said Scott, that he served during the full time from May 21 to October 30, upon which day he resigned because he could not be duly mustered as a lieutenant and aid-de-camp. All evidence produced in this case shows the said Scott to have been a brave and gallant officer. The committee therefore recommend that he be paid the full pay and emoluments of a first lieutenant from May 21, 1862, to October 30, 1862.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

DEWIGHT DESILVA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1936) for the relief of Dewight Desilva, of Deposit, New York.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Adjutant-General of the Army to change his record so as to relieve Dewight Desilva, of Deposit, New York, late a private in Company F, Fifty-sixth Regiment New York State Volunteers, from the charge of desertion, and to furnish him an honorable discharge. The second section authorizes and directs the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to allow and pay to said Dewight Desilva all arrears of pay due him at the time of his absenting himself from his regiment and all veteran bounty, the same as if he had been honorably discharged at the end of his term of service.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the case of Dewight Desilva, report favorably the accompanying bill, and ask its passage:

Dewight Desilva enlisted on the 21st day of August, 1861, in Company F, Fifty-sixth Regiment New York State Volunteers, and served faithfully until the 20th day of December, 1864, re-enlisting with his regiment on the 20th of February, 1864. He was given a pass to go from Deveraux Neck, South Carolina, to Morris Island, to see a sick friend who was dying. Upon being about to return, he was unable to obtain transportation farther than Hilton Head. He there fell in with some friends, commenced drinking, got on board a steamer, fell asleep, and was carried to sea. He afterward returned to his home in New York, and at once reported to his lieutenant-colonel, who was at home on sick-leave, who permitted him to remain at home until he was ready to return; that by a previous engagement he reported at a hotel in New York, where he was to meet his lieutenant-colonel, but not finding him, reported himself to the provost-marshal of his district, under the President's proclamation, and was dishonorably discharged. It appears from all the evidence before the committee that Desilva did all in his power to report himself to his proper commanding officer; and they therefore report in favor of relieving him from the stigma of desertion.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

RESTORATIONS TO POSITIONS IN THE ARMY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1051) for the restoration to their several positions in the Army of Captain J. Horace McGuire, First Lieutenant Henry B. Gardner, Second Lieutenant William D. McGuire, and Second Lieutenant William C. Reddy.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I desire to offer a substitute for that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition to amend is equivalent to an objection; and objection being made, the bill goes over.

JOAB BAGLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 294) for the relief of Joab Bagley.

The bill was read.

In its preamble it recites that, on the 30th day of September, 1858, under and by virtue of an act of Congress approved March 3, 1855, land-warrant numbered 95116, for one hundred and twenty acres of land, was issued to one James McAdory, and by him afterward duly sold and assigned to Joab Bagley, a citizen of Jefferson County, in the State of Alabama, who, on the 21st day of September, 1862, located the said land-warrant in the purchase of the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter and the south half of the northeast quarter of section 6, township 18, range 2 west, in the Tuscaloosa land district, in the State of Alabama; which said location of said land-warrant is alleged to have been made in good faith, but under a law (or pretended law) of the State of Alabama authorizing the location of land-warrants in said State; and that it is alleged that said land-warrant has been lost or destroyed, and that the same has not been returned to or filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, but that notice of the loss thereof has been given to the said Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The bill therefore provides that, upon the payment, by said Joab Bagley, of the minimum price to the proper officer of the Government of the United States for said land, to wit, the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter and the south half of the northeast quarter of section 6, township 18, range 2 west, in the Tuscaloosa land district, in the State of Alabama, as by law required, estimating the said land-warrant at its value, to wit, $1.25 per acre, the balance to be paid in cash, the title to the said real estate be, and the same is hereby, confirmed in the said Joab Bagley, his heirs and assigns; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby authorized and required to issue letters-patent conveying the title to said lands to the said Joab Bagley.

The second section provides that the act shall not impair, make void, or in any way interfere with, any prior valid claim to the said real estate in the preceding section described.

The report was read, as follows:

The Judiciary Committee, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Joab Bagley, submit the following report:

That the case as stated in the preamble to the bill is sustained by the following evidence:

First. A copy of the certificate of Thomas Donoho, the register and receiver in the land office at Tuscaloosa, Alabama, in the usual form of such certificates of the money required by law, including the lost land-warrant, and estimating at $150, to enter the lands described in the bill. This certificate is dated Receiver's Office at Tuscaloosa, September 21, 1862.

Second. The affidavit of Joab Bagley, as to issuance of the land-warrant No. 95116, issued under the act of Congress of March 3, 1858, to James McAdory, and its assignment to him by McAdory for a valuable consideration, and that with it in part, and paying the balance in money, he entered the land described in the bill; that he has made diligent inquiry for, and caused search to be made for, said land-warrant, in the office of the register of the land office at Montgomery, and is informed that it cannot be found there, Montgomery land office being the place to which, during the war, the certificate would be sent from the land office at Tuscaloosa; that the said land-warrant is lost, and that he has filed notice of its loss in the General Land Office in Washington.

We think it sufficiently certain that Mr. Bagley is the owner of the certificate, and its loss only deprives him of that which is the highest evidence of his right, but does not take from him the right, as he only asks that he shall be allowed to again enter the land, paying for it at the double minimum price, and that the lost land-warrent shall be estimated at its value and received in part pay for the land. It seems that it is just and proper that this request should be granted.

The bill also provides that this act shall not impair, or make void, or in any way interfere with, any prior valid claim to the said real estate.

We therefore report favorably upon the bill.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

SURETIES OF JAMES L. COLLINS.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was House bill No. 1939, for the relief of the sureties of James L. Collins, deceased.

The first section of the bill provides that Hamilton G. Fant, William Craig, John S. Watts, Vincent St. Vrain, and William W. Mills, sureties of James L. Collins, deceased, on his official bond, as late receiver of public moneys, and as designated depositary at Santa Fé, New Mexico, they, and their heirs and legal representatives, shall be released and discharged from all liability on said bond, and from the judgment recovered thereon in favor of the United States.

The second section authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, on final adjustment and settlement of the accounts of James L. Collins, deceased, late receiver and United States designated depositary of public moneys at Santa Fé, New Mexico, to pass to his credit the amount of money stolen from the United States depository at Santa Fé, New Mexico, after the murder of said Collins, on the night of June 5, 1869, and for which a judgment was recovered in the district court of New Mexico in favor of the United States against the sureties of said Collins, or part of them, for $32,561.03 and $6,032.32 interest; and to pay to the legal representatives of said Collins such sum, not exceeding $1,168.18, as may be shown to have been due and owing said Collins at the time of his murder.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of the sureties of James L. Collins, deceased, for the relief from payment of funds stolen from the United States depository at Santa Fé, New Mexico, after said Collins had been killed and murdered by robbers, having had the same under advisement, respectfully report:

That Hamilton G. Fant, of Georgetown, District of Columbia, William Craig, of Colorado, John S. Watts, of Santa Fé, New Mexico, Vincent St. Vrain, of ——, and William W. Mills, of El Paso, Texas, on the 16th day of May, 1866, became the sureties of said Collins, receiver of the land office and United States designated depositary at Santa Fé, New Mexico, in the sum of $150,000.

That said Collins discharged the duties of said office from May 16, 1866, to June 5, 1869.

That on the night of June 5, 1869, the said depository was entered, and on the following morning said Collins was found lying dead in the office-room of said depository, in his night-clothes, with a bullet-hole through his body in the region of his heart; the vaults, which contained the money, the property of the United States, opened, and considerable sums, to wit, about $100,000, gone, while some $300,000 other funds in said vaults, like property of the United States, were not taken.

That a few days after said 5th of June a sack containing $65,600 of said funds was found in a brewery near by and restored to said depository, leaving a deficit in the funds belonging to said depository of $32,000 or thereabouts.

Said Collins had been superseded in his said office by the appointment of G. W. Little, and was about to turn over his office to said Little. Collins was found dead on Sunday morning, and he had arranged to turn over his office on Monday.

Preparatory to such turning over, with James M. Edgar, his clerk, and John T. Russell, now deceased, a former clerk, he had thoroughly examined his books, counted the moneys on hand, and all were found correct.

Your committee are satisfied, from the evidence, that said Collins was an excellent officer; he had always borne a high character for integrity, patriotism, and courage; he was well advanced in years—over sixty; reasonably well off, of good habits, lived simply and cheaply; he was thoroughly devoted to the proper discharge of every duty, and he was, in the opinion of your committee, wickedly and cruelly murdered while bravely attempting to defend the property of the United States against unknown thieves and robbers.

That all the moneys of the United States belonging in said depository, and for which said sureties were bound, were in the vaults of said depository at the time of said robbery and murder, and that the deficit from which said sureties ask relief was caused solely by robbery committed by the same person or persons who murdered the said James L. Collins.

Suit was brought against said sureties in the United States district court, in Santa Fé, New Mexico, and judgment rendered against John S. Watts, Hamilton G. Fant, William W. Mills, and William Craig, for $32,561.03, with interest in the sum of $6,032.32, making a total of $38,593.35; and from which judgment an appeal has been taken.

The evidence further tends to show, and your committee is of opinion, that the sum of $1,168.18 was justly due said Collins from the United States at the time of said murder, which has never been paid.

Further, this whole matter was before the Judiciary Committee of the Forty-second Congress; a bill like the one herewith submitted was reported to the House of Representatives, and passed that body March 3, 1873.

In consideration of the premises, your committee recommend for passage the accompanying bill.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

GEORGE P. FISHER.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1171) for the relief of George P. Fisher.

The bill appropriates the sum of $576.25 to reimburse George P. Fisher for his costs and expenses incurred in defending suits at law brought against him by Joseph H. Bradley, in the year 1868, for acts done by said Fisher while in discharge of his duty as a justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding the criminal court of said District.

The report accompanying the bill was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 117) for the relief of George P. Fisher, having had the same under advisement, respectfully report:

That in 1867 said George P. Fisher was one of the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia. That as such justice he presided in the criminal branch of said court at the trial of John H. Surratt for the murder of President Lincoln. That during the progress of said trial some "unpleasantness" sprang up between the counsel of Surratt and a witness. The said Fisher, presiding judge as aforesaid, thereupon reprimanded the witness, and cautioned the counsel against making "side-bar" remarks reflecting upon witness, to which caution Mr. Bradley, senior counsel for Surratt, took exception. That said Bradley, one evening after the court had closed for the day, sharply demanded of said Fisher what he meant by constantly insulting him, the said Bradley, from the bench. Said Fisher replied he was not conscious of insulting him, said Bradley, and that if he had he was sorry for it. Said Bradley reiterated the demand, and threatened said Fisher with personal chastisement. Said Fisher replied that he was too sick to engage in any personal contest, to which Bradley replied that he would offset his age against the judge's sickness. A deputy marshal interposed, and said judge passed from the court-room.

Thereupon said Fisher consulted with the other justices of said supreme court, and they concurred in the opinion that if Mr. Bradley did not voluntarily make some proper apology before the close of said trial, said Fisher could do no less than strike the name of said Bradley from the roll of attorneys of the court over which said Fisher was presiding.

No apology was offered by said Bradley during the thirty succeeding days of said trial. At the close of said trial said Fisher, presiding judge, as aforesaid, did enter an order striking the name of said Bradley from the roll of attorneys of said court, and at the adjournmnt of said court said Bradley followed said Fisher into a street car, and handed him a letter in the nature of a challenge; this was the 10th day of August, and the letter bore date the 6th of same month.

Bradley brought two suits against Fisher; one for trespass in expelling him, the other for alleged libel in the order of expulsion. The said suits of said Bradley were decided against said Bradley in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and this decision affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Some two or three months after the entry by said Fisher of said order striking the name of said Bradley from the roll of attorneys of said criminal court, the other justices of said supreme court struck the name of said Bradley from the roll of attorneys of said court.

In the defense and management of said suits, brought by said Bradley, said Fisher was compelled to employ, and did employ, Messrs. Riddle and Cooke, and paid them $500, and for printing briefs, &c., he paid the sum of $76.25, making the sum of $576.25, which said Fisher asks to have refunded to him.

Later, and after said Fisher had retired from the position of justice of said court, said Bradley again assaulted said Fisher in a way indicating great bitterness and malice toward Fisher, the only cause for which was the action of Fisher striking Bradley's name from the roll of attorneys of said court; and such action was plainly within the power of said Fisher as a justice of said supreme court of the District of Columbia, presiding in the criminal branch thereof, and in view of the circumstances of the case a proper and justifiable act—one which received the approval of all the justices of said court, as well as the approval of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The committee therefore recommend that the said bill be passed.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

JESSE J. SIMKINS.

The next business upon the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1200) for the relief of the sureties of the late Jesse J. Simkins, collector of the port of Norfolk, Virginia.

Mr. HOLMAN. As there is no opportunity to debate this bill, I must object to its consideration at this time.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

FREDERICK F. BAURY.

The next business upon the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1941) to provide for the appointment of Frederick F. Baury on the retired list of the Navy.

Mr. WHITTHORNE objected, and the bill was accordingly passed over.

WILLIAM HAFFORDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 497) granting a pension to William Haffords, of South Yarmouth, Massachusetts.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Haffords, of South Yarmouth, Massachusetts.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 497) granting a pension to William Haffords, South Yarmouth, Massachusetts, having considered the same, submit the following report:

William Haffords, the applicant, was appointed an acting master in the United States Navy, February 15, 1862, to date from November 14, 1861, and for meritorious services was promoted to acting volunteer lieutenant November 3, 1863, and was chief pilot to Admiral Dahlgren. About September 1, 1863, he was ordered, by Admiral Dahlgren, to board the monitor Lehigh and pilot a reconnaissance between Forts Sumter and Moultrie, and while performing this duty, the night being dark and the monitor being under fire at the time, he fell from the turret, fracturing his skull, breaking his nose, and otherwise injuring him, from the effects of which, physicians certify, he has ever since suffered and is now suffering.

The pension is refused under the general law, because the journal of the surgeon of the Philadelphia shows that Haffords was received for treatment of fracture of skull, and says it "did not originate in line of duty," and he was transferred in a few days to the Powhatan. The committee, considering these facts, with the affidavit of the applicant and the statement of Rear-Admiral Steedman, who commanded the Powhatan at that time, that the monitor was under fire when Haffords was injured, are fully satisfied that he was injured in line of duty, and considering the case exceedingly meritorious, we therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

JEFFERSON W. DAVIS.

The next business upon the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1054) granting a pension to Jefferson W. Davis, first lieutenant Company F, Sixty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jefferson W. Davis, first lieutenant of Company F, Sixty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers, and pay him a pension as a first lieutenant from the date of discharge.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1054) granting a pension to Jefferson W. Davis, first lieutenant Company F, Sixty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers, having considered the same, submit the following report:

It appears to the committee, from the evidence in this case, that the petitioner was a first sergeant in Company F, Sixty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers, and that in May, 1864, the commanding officer of his regiment recommended him for promotion to a first lieutenancy in said regiment; a commission as such was duly granted by the governor of New York, bearing date May 28, 1864, and to rank from May 12, 1864. Prior to the receipt of said commission, to wit, May 12, 1864, he was wounded in battle and sent to hospital, said wound being in his left arm, and for which his arm was amputated May 30, 1864.

It also appears that First Lieutenant George R. Fisk, of Company F, Sixty-fourth New York Volunteers, was killed in battle May 12, 1864, thus causing a vacancy for a first lieutenant in said company.

In view of the foregoing facts the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

MARTHA E. NORTHUP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1112) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha E. Northup, widow of First Lieutenant Edward B. Northup, late of the Seventeenth United States Infantry.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Martha E. Northup, widow of First Lieutenant Edward B. Northup, late of the Seventeenth United States Infantry, and pay her a pension of seventeen dollars per month, commencing March 4, 1873, during her widowhood.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1122) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha E. Northup, widow of First Lieutenant Edward B. Northup, late of the Seventeenth United States Infantry, having considered the same, submit the following report:

Edward B. Northup, husband of the applicant, entered the Army as a private in the Forty-fourth Regiment of New York Volunteers (Ellsworth Avengers) in 1861; was present with his regiment at the siege of Yorktown, and in the battles of Mechanicsville, Hanover Court-House, Gaines's Mill, and Malvern Hill. At the last-named battle he was badly wounded, and soon after discharged for disability arising from the same. He was appointed a second lieutenant in the Veteran Reserve Corps, United States Volunteers, and soon after promoted first lieutenant, for gallant services during General Early's raid on Washington; when he was again wounded, in the hand. He resigned from the Veteran Reserve Corps November, 1866, and was appointed second lieutenant in the Forty-fourth Regiment United States Infantry, July, 1866, which appointment into the regular Army was made by the War Department purely on account of his fine military record; brevetted first lieutenant United States Army for gallant and meritorious services on the peninsula of Virginia; transferred to the Seventeenth Infantry May 27, 1869; promoted first lieutenant January 1, 1871, and died March 4, 1873, from an overdose of chloral, administered by his own hand through mistake, without criminal intent, as is shown by the verdict of the coroner's jury at Sioux City, Iowa, while en route to join his command at Grand River agency, Dakota Territory, and while returning from a leave of absence. Entering the Army when only seventeen years of age, he served his country faithfully for twelve years, and was twice wounded, and twice promoted for gallant services. Your committee, therefore, considering the fact that the widow is left without means of support, think she is justly entitled to the pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

HELEN M. STANSBURY.

The next business upon the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1943) granting a pension to Helen M. Stansbury.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Helen M. Stansbury, widow of Howard Stansbury, late major in the Topographical Engineer Corps, and pay her a pension as the widow of a major, in lieu of the one now paid her as the widow of a captain, from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Helen M. Stansbury, having considered the same, submit the following report:

Helen M. Stansbury, the petitioner, is the widow of Howard Stansbury, some time major in the Corps of Topographical Engineers, and who died at Madison, Wisconsin, April 17, 1863. He contracted disease while a captain of engineers, commanding an exploring party in the valley of Salt Lake, in the year 1859, and from the effects of which he was retired from the service September 28, 1861, he then being a major. In 1862 and 1863 Major Stansbury entered upon active duty, and acted as mustering and disbursing officer for the Government at Madison, Wisconsin, and while acting in this capacity general prostration was produced by the over-exertion and exhausting fatigue in the performance of his labors, which caused his death.

The widow now draws a pension as the widow of a captain, for the reason that the disease contracted by her husband while a captain aggravated the immediate cause of his death; but the committee, considering the fact that Major Stansbury was doing extra duty to the Government as a retired officer, and also the fact that he might have lived much longer had it not been for the overexertion as mustering officer while he was a major, are of the opinion that the case is a meritorious one, and that the widow should receive a pension due to the rank of her husband. We therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

CHILDREN OF MICHAEL WEISSE.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 700) granting a pension to the minor children of Michael Weisse, deceased.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the names of the minor children of Michael Weisse, deceased, late of Company K, Ninth Regiment Michigan Infantry, that were under sixteen years of age on the 1st day of October, 1871.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Barbara Richards, guardian of the minor children of Michael Weisse, deceased, late of Company K, Ninth Regiment Michigan Infantry, beg leave to report:

That said Barbara Richards was formerly the widow of Michael Weisse, who died in the United States service; that as such widow she received a pension by certificate No. 120,304; that the minor children drew two dollars each per month; that on the 1st day of October, 1871, she intermarried with William Richards; that she supposed, as their guardian, she could continue to draw their pensions for them so long as they were under sixteen years of age; that the Pension Office holds that the pension to her children was stopped by her marriage. From all the facts and circumstances of the case the Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend the passage of the accompanying bill (H. R. No. 700.)

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

CHARLOTTE CRANE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1944) granting a pension to Charlotte Crane, widow of the late Colonel Ichabod B. Crane, of the First Artillery, regular Army of the United States.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charlotte Crane, widow of the late Colonel Ichabod B. Crane, of the First Artillery, regular Army of the United States.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1944) for the relief of Charlotte Crane, having had the same under consideration, report:

The said Charlotte Crane is the widow of the late Ichabod B. Crane, colonel First Artillery, United States Army, who was, in January, 1809, appointed a lieutenant in the Marine Corps, and served with Decatur in the frigate United States, and was transferred to the United States Army, and served faithfully for many years, under the most trying circumstances, filling all the different grades through which he passed with distinction, until, after forty-eight years of service, he died, in 1857, of disease contracted in the service, while on the retired list.

The committee, in view of the well-known and meritorious services of the late husband of the petitioner, recommend that her name be placed upon the roll of pensioners, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

JULIET E. HALL.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1945) granting a pension to Juliet E. Hall, daughter of William H. Hall, late colonel of the Eleventh Regiment of Iowa Infantry.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Juliet E. Hall, daughter of William H. Hall, late a colonel of the Eleventh Regiment of Iowa Infantry, commencing November 11, 1869, the date of the remarriage of the widow.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Juliet E. Guild, guardian of Juliet Elsie Hall, minor child of William H. Hall, late colonel Eleventh Iowa Volunteers, beg leave to report:

That Colonel William H. Hall was discharged from the service August 1, 1864, and died December 20, 1865.

The widow (Juliet E.) of Colonel Hall applied for pension April 30, 1866, and the same was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions, and on the 1st day of March, 1869, the said widow was granted a pension of thirty dollars per month by a special act of Congress; that the pension ceased on the 11th day of November, 1869, (date of remarriage of widow;) and the petitioner now asks that her name be placed on the pension-rolls as guardian of said minor from the date of remarriage until she arrives at the age of sixteen years.

John G. Miller, late surgeon of the Eleventh Iowa Volunteers, and Frederick Lloyd, late surgeon of the Sixteenth Iowa Volunteers, state under oath, that they treated Colonel Hall while in the service, and give it as their opinion that his death was caused from disease contracted and injuries received while in the service.

Dr. Baker, of Davenport, Iowa, states under oath that he treated Colonel Hall after his discharge, and during his last illness, and gives it as his opinion that his death was caused by injuries received and disease contracted while in the service.

Dr. Samuel Davis states under oath that he treated Colonel Hall while in the service, and gives it as his opinion that he was not a sound man when he entered the same, but that the fatigue and exposure while in the service were the cause of his death.

It is the opinion of your committee that Colonel Hall died of disease contracted while in the service of the United States, therefore do report favorably and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

MARY BOYD DALLAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1946) restoring the name of Mary Boyd Dallas to the pension-roll.

The bill was read. It relieves Mary Boyd Dallas, widow of the late Captain Alexander J. Dallas, United States Navy, from the operation of the provisions of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government, or who may have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862, and restores her to the said rolls, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws now in force.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Mary Boyd Dallas, widow of the late Captain Alexander James Dallas, United States Navy, submit the following report:

The proof shows that the said Captain Alexander J. Dallas entered the Navy as midshipman the 22d of November, 1805; that he served his country faithfully and with credit, having distinguished himself in several naval engagements, and died on the 3d day of June, 1844, in command of the Pacific squadron, on board the frigate Savannah, at Callao, Peru, having served in the Navy continuously for thirty-nine years, during all of which time he had but nine months' leave of absence.

That petitioner, Mary B. Dallas, of Pensacola, Florida, and widow of said Captain Dallas, was pensioned by the Government at the rate of fifty dollars per month, commencing June 3, 1849, which was continued up to the passage of the act of February 4, 1862, which directed that all persons residing in States in rebellion against the United States be stricken from the rolls. At the close of the war Mrs. Dallas applied for a renewal of her pension, and her name was restored to the rolls, and she again received pension until it was discovered that she had signed a petition to the rebel congress, expressing sympathy for the South, and asking the enactment of a law continuing to the widows of deceased officers of the Army and Navy of the late United States, who are citizens of the Confederate States, the same pension they received from the Government of the United States, when her name was again dropped from the rolls. Mrs. Dallas does not deny that she sympathized with the cause of the rebellion, or that she signed the petition as recited, but does deny that she understood the full import of the same, but was advised to this by friends, in the hope of again receiving the gratuity formerly allowed her by the Government, the same being then her only means of support.

In view of the long-continued service of Captain Dallas, his death in a foreign land, the services of his son, Major A. J. Dallas, during the late war, and of a second son who escaped from the South and joined the Union Army, and of circumstances which surrounded petitioner, her age, sex, and condition in life, together with the recommendations of distinguished officers of the Army, your committee report favorably, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill restoring her pension.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

WILLIAM D. BOYD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1275) granting a pension to William D. Boyd, of Johnson County, Kentucky.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William D. Boyd, who was a private in Company E, First Regiment Kentucky Capitol Guards, and who did service in the war against the rebellion, and lost an arm in said service; the pension to date from the 11th day of March, 1865, when he was mustered out of service.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1275) entitled "A bill granting a pension to William D. Boyd," report:

That the evidence shows that said Boyd, on the 4th day of June, 1864, was enrolled and on the 4th day of July, 1864, was mustered into the service as a private in Company E, First Regiment Capitol Guards, State Volunteers, to serve six months, or during the war. It appears from the rolls that he was mustered out with his company March 11, 1865, and there is no record evidence of his disability; but it appears that the entire records and effects of the State military hospital, wherein the proof shows that said Boyd was treated, were, under orders of the adjutant-general of the State of Kentucky, turned over to the United States Medical Department April 6, 1865; and that during the raids which the State suffered in 1864 and 1865, many of the company returns and hospital reports were destroyed, and the records wanting in this case are not to be found. It is proved that in July, 1864, said Boyd, while in the service and in the line of his duty at Lawrenceburgh, Kentucky, was accidentally shot through the left arm near the shoulder by the accidental discharge of a gun of a comrade in the service, which necessitated the amputation of the arm near the shoulder, which was done; and he was treated for the same in the military hospital at Frankfort, Kentucky; that the militia in which he was serving was subject to orders from the United States authority, and was doing service for the United States in the war against the rebellion. Wherefore the committee report back said bill and recommend its passage.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

JANE LA FONT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 816) granting a pension to Jane La Font.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jane La Font, dependent mother of Lewis La Font, late a private of Company C, Second Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, but detailed to Battery D, First Rhode Island Light Artillery, to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 816) granting a pension to Jane La Font, make the following report:

The proof shows that the soldier, her son, Lewis La Font, enlisted, and was mustered into Company C, Second Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, April 22, 1861, for three years or during the war, as a private, and was subsequently transferred to Battery D, First Rhode Island Light Artillery, and was killed at Lexington, Kentucky, June 2, 1863. The late first lieutenant of said Battery D swears that said Lewis La Font, on the 8th day of June, 1863, while in the service of the United States, and in the line of his duty as a soldier, at Lexington, Kentucky, was placed in the guard-house for intoxication; that while confined in said guard-house he was accidentally knocked down stairs, and was instantly killed by said fall; and that said soldier was not intoxicated at the time of his fall, and that he was knocked down through no fault of his own.

The proof further shows that said soldier was never married, and was about twenty-two years of age when he enlisted; that up to that time he had made his home with his parents, Edward La Font and Jane La Font, the petitioner, who were lawfully married July 2?, 1834; that said Edward for the last fifteen years has been afflicted with lumbago, and disabled from performing manual labor; that said Edward and Jane had not over $310 worth of property; and that said Jane, at the time of the soldier's enlistment, and ever after, until his death, was dependent upon him for support; that before his enlistment he contributed the most of his earnings to the support of his parents; and after his enlistment he sent to his mother, out of his earnings, sums of money at different times, amounting in the whole to $275; that said soldier was engaged in the first Bull Run battle, and, in all, he was in some thirteen engagements.

Wherefore, the committee report back the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

MARY S. PRINCE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1234) granting a pension to Mary S. Prince.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary S. Prince, mother of Henry Leach alias Henry Leach Prince, late a seaman on board the United States ship Potomac, to take effect from the passage of the act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1234) granting a pension to Mary S. Prince, submit the following report:

It appears in proof that the applicant was the lawful wife of Sewall Prince, who died on October 4, 1827; that Henry Leach alias Henry Leach Prince, on account of whose services the pension is claimed, was her lawful son by her said husband; that said Henry served in the United States Navy as follows: About nine months on the Wave in 1838-'39; that in the fall of 1839 he enlisted in the United States Navy at Baltimore, and was sent to the receiving-ship Java as a seaman, and served on her until December 31, 1839, and on the Delaware from January 1, 1840, to August 1, 1840, inclusive, when he was paid off and discharged "unfit for duty," upon the request of the applicant, said Henry being then sick. He re-enlisted at Havana April 14, 1842, and served on the Phœnix from that date to July 31, 1842, and on the Pennsylvania from August 1, 1842, to February 25, 1843, and from that date to May 19, 1843, on the Saint Louis, and again on the Pennsylvania from that date to July 11, 1843, and from July 12, 1843, to April 14, 1845, inclusive, on the Levant, when he was paid off and discharged. He again enlisted January 14, 1846, and served on different United States vessels of war until September 30, 1847, when he was sent to hospital at Pensacola, and remained there until November 10, 1847, when he was paid off and discharged. He was on the Potomac when she was ordered to the Gulf, and he participated in the bombardment of Vera Cruz in March, 1847, and was one of the twenty who volunteered from the Potomac to assist in the night attack on Tabasco, June 15, 1847, in which fight he received a saber-thrust in the chest, penetrating the right lung, in consequence of which he was sent to the hospital.

During said service, from the effects of exposure, injuries, and the climate, he contracted disease of which he died February 13, 1850. The said Mary was dependent upon her said son for support. She has no property and is now aged and dependent upon charity, and has always remained the widow of her said husband.

The third section of the act of July 14, 1862, being the first act passed by Congress entitling dependent mothers to a pension on account of the services of their deceased sons, applies only to cases of death subsequently to March, 1861, and so does not cover the present case.

But it appears that five generations of this petitioner's family have been engaged in the service of the country. Her grandfather and two of her uncles were revolutionary soldiers. Her father was a captain in the war of 1812. Her husband was also a soldier in the war of 1812, and was also on board the Eagle in the naval engagement on Lake Champlain. Her son Charles was in the war of the rebellion, and was discharged for disabilities contracted in the service; and three grandsons were in the same war for the Union, and a fourth offered his services, but was rejected on examination as not being able-bodied. One of said grandsons was mortally wounded in the service, one twice wounded, and one escaped injury. That the foregoing are all the male members of her family but two, and these two were not within the age of enlistment. Members of her family have been in all the wars of the country that called for volunteers. Therefore the committee report back said bill and recommend its passage.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

TIMOTHY PAIGE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 216) granting a pension to Timothy Paige.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Timothy Paige, father of Wilkinson W. Page, late captain of Company M, Tenth Regiment New York Cavalry Volunteers, to take effect from the passage of the act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 216) granting a pension to Timothy Paige, make the following report:

The evidence shows that the soldier, Wilkinson W. Paige, late captain in Company M, Tenth Regiment New York Cavalry, was a son of said Timothy, and was killed on the 24th day of June, 1864, in battle, at Saint Mary's Church, while in the line of his duty, in the service; that the wife of said Timothy, the mother of said Wilkinson, died before the death of said Wilkinson W.; that said Timothy, at the time of said Wilkinson's enlistment, was very poor and wholly dependent on him for support; and he is still very poor and in feeble health, is over seventy years of age, and is incapable of supporting himself by his labor. The soldier was married in 1850 to a Michigan lady, by whom he had a son, named George W. Wilkinson. She was divorced from said Wilkinson in 1856, and married again in 1857, and removed to the interior of Minnesota, taking with her the said son. In 1859 it was understood and believed by the relatives at Buffalo, New York, where said Wilkinson then resided, that the boy was dead; and said Wilkinson so informed said Timothy; who, believing that said boy was dead, did, in 1867, apply for, and in April, 1867, obtain, a pension, dating from April 19, 1867, which he received until March 4, 1869, when it was discovered that the minor, George W., was still alive; and he, by his guardian, filed an application in March, 1869, and obtained a pension from date of soldier's death to January 28, 1868, at which time George became sixteen years old. The Pension Bureau caused the case to be examined, and the old gentleman, Timothy, succeeded in getting $100, all he could get, and refunded it to the Government. It was made so entirely clear to the officer who had the case in charge that the old gentleman had acted with entire honesty in the transaction, that he recommended that the $100 be paid back to him, and that a certificate be granted him from the date when the minor becomes sixteen years of age, former payments to be deducted; and all proceedings against him were dismissed.

The entire integrity of the petitioner is shown conclusively; his destitution, and the fact of his entire dependence upon his son, whom he gave to the country, are proved beyond question. The soldier was commissioned as captain while in the service.

Wherefore the committee report back the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

THOMAS J. M'INTIRE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1396) granting a pension to Thomas J. McIntire, of Rowan County, Kentucky.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas J. McIntire, late a private of Lieutenant John P. Beach's company, (45,) Second Battery of Veteran Reserve Corps, and pay him a pension from the passage of the act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1396) granting a pension to Thomas J. McIntire, of Rowan County, Kentucky, report:

That said McIntire enlisted as a private of Lieutenant John P. Beach's company, (45,) Second Battalion of Veteran Reserve Corps, August 27, 1861, for three years, or during the war, and was discharged from the United States service October 12, 1864, at Lexington, Kentucky, by reason of expiration of term of service; that after his discharge, and while returning home, in passing through Bath County, Kentucky, he encountered a scouting party of rebel soldiers, and he took shelter in the brick dwelling-house of Joseph Myers and gave them battle, and fought them until compelled to surrender by the rebels having set the house on fire, and then the party took him away about six miles and knocked him on the head, fracturing his skull, and left him for dead; that he was confined, from the effects of said injury, several months, and he still suffers from the effects of said injury to such an extent as to prevent him from earning his support by his own labor. He has no wife or children, and is very poor, and dependent upon charity for support. Wherefore, the committee report back said bill and recommend its passage.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

WILLIAM H. EDWARDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1445) to reinstate William H. Edwards on the pension-roll.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to reinstate upon the pension-roll the name of William H. Edwards, late of Company —, Fourth Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, and to pay him a pension at the rate now allowed by law.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William H. Edwards, late a sergeant in Company I, Fourth Tennessee Cavalry, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

Amend the title so that it will read, "A bill granting a pension to William H. Edwards."

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1445) to reinstate William H. Edwards on the pension-roll, report:

That said Edwards enlisted as a private in Company L, Fourth Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, February 25, 1864, and was mustered in April 21, 1864, at Nashville, to serve three years; was promoted to be sergeant, and was mustered out with his company July 25, 1865, at Nashville.

The proof is clear from his officers, M. O. White, captain of Company L; L. Blizand, also a captain of said company; F. P. Bishop, lieutenant and regimental quartermaster of said regiment; Meshack Stevens, late major Fourth Tennessee Cavalry; M. C. White, late captain Company I, of said regiment; and Lieutenant-Colonel Thornborough, that the petitioner was a sound, healthy man when he entered the service, and that while marching through Alabama and Georgia, and while in line of his duty, before the capture of Atlanta by the Union forces, he contracted piles, in its worst form; in consequence of which he has been obliged to submit to several surgical operations, and at times his life has been despaired of, and his health ruined, insomuch that he is, and ever has been since the war, unable to earn a support by manual labor. These officers speak in the highest terms of him as a faithful soldier. Lieutenant Bishop, in closing his testimony, says of him, "I further believe the United States never had a more loyal subject or truer friend than William H. Edwards, since he joined the Fourth Tennessee Cavalry, and since the close of the war."

It is in evidence that he was, before he enlisted in said cavalry, connected with the rebel forces; and that, upon that ground, his claim for a pension was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions.

Upon this point, Joseph A. Cooper, late brigadier-general, and brevet major-general, United States Army, testifies that he is personally acquainted with the petitioner, and has known his father and mother ever since his birth; and that prior to his enlistment in the Federal Army, said Edwards was connected with the rebel army, "not, as I believe, from his sympathy with the cause of the southern confederacy, but from his association with some of his neighbors; and from the belief that he would be forced into the army. Further, that while my command was at Pine-Knot, Campbell County, Tennessee, in April, I received from Mrs. Edwards, mother of said petitioner, information, in person, of an intended movement of the rebel force to surprise and capture the whole of our command; and that said information came from said W. H. Edwards to his mother, and she to me; and I sent her to General George N. Morgan, commander, and he, acting upon the information she gave, moved the command at once, leaving the sick in camp; and immediately after our command had moved the rebels did come and capture all the sick that were left behind; and had it not been for the information thus furnished, I verily believe the whole command would have been captured. I further know that said Mrs. Edwards entered into agreement with General Morgan to continue to give information which would be useful to the Federal Army, and that she gave much valuable information, and imperiled her life and that of her family, and especially of her husband, who was arrested and imprisoned by the rebel forces, because of her loyalty, and her conduct favoring the Federal forces; and that she came by night over the mountains, through rain and snow; and I believe much of her information, thus furnished, was obtained from said W. H. Edwards, who improved the opportunity he had while in the rebel army to get such information."

And M. C. White, late captain of Company I, Fourth Tennessee Cavalry, testifies as follows: "I believe he (said Edwards) did more while in seeming voluntary service in the rebel army, for the support and assistance of the Federal Army, and the loyal men of East Tennessee, in the way of giving information than he could possibly have done in any other way."

Therefore the committee report the accompanying bill as a substitute for the one referred, and recommend its passage.

The amendments were agreed to.

No objection being made, the bill as amended was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

GEORGE HOLMES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1947) granting a pension to George Holmes.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George Holmes, late private in the Seventh Maine Battery, and to pay him a pension of eight dollars a month, dating from the passage of the act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of George Holmes, for a pension, submit the following report:

The proof is that said Holmes, on the 18th day of December, 1863, enlisted as a private in Seventh Battery, Light Artillery, Maine Volunteers; and was honorably discharged therefrom on the 22d of June, 1864, for disability. That while in the line of his duty as such private, while said company was stationed at post hospital, Camp Barry, near Washington, District of Columbia, he took a severe cold, which brought on a lung fever in March, 1864. He remained at Camp Barry until April 26, 1864, when he was taken to Lincoln Hospital, Washington, District of Columbia, and remained there until his said discharge, when he returned to his home in Maine, where he has remained ever since. For several months after his return home he was unable to go out of his house; his lungs, in consequence of said sickness, became diseased, and he is troubled with hemorrhage therefrom; can move round only slowly, and is, by reason of said disease so contracted, totally disabled, and permanently disabled thereby to procure a subsistence by manual labor; and is in needy circumstances, and must soon come to want.

The proof is clear, from the testimony of George E. Brackett, assistant surgeon, United States Army, who examined said Holmes when he was mustered in, and of H. F. Wardwell, his family physician, and of Calvin Morrison, who had known him intimately for twenty years, and up to the time of his enlistment, and by Holmes himself, who is proved to have always been a man of good habits, and truthful, that said Holmes was free from disease when he enlisted, and it is proved by William B. Lapham that the disease was contracted as above set forth.

Wherefore the committee submit the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

MARY J. BLOOD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1948) granting a pension to Mary J. Blood.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary J. Blood, widow of Emery A. Blood, late private in Company D, Eleventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, and pay her a pension of eight dollars a month, commencing at the death of said Emery A. Blood, on the 13th of November, 1868.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mary J. Blood, widow of Emery Blood, late private in Company D, Eleventh Massachusetts Volunteers, submits the following report:

The evidence shows that the soldier was mustered into the service June 28, 1861, and discharged October 4, 1861, for disability; that he subsequently applied for a pension, which application was rejected March 17, 1862, upon the ground that the evidence did not prove that the disease of which he was suffering was contracted while he was in the service of the United States. He died March 13, 1868.

In May, 1871, his widow, the present petitioner, who was married to him in 1862, filed her petition for a pension, which was rejected February 3, 1873, upon the ground that the evidence did not prove that the soldier died of disease contracted while in the service of the United States.

The evidence is briefly this:

That he was mustered in as sound.

Moses Pearson, a merchant of Boston, testifies that he knew the soldier many years before he entered the Army, and while he was in the Army, and afterward; that the soldier was formerly in his employ, and that, until he entered the Army, he was a well, strong man; and that ever after he was discharged he was sick, until he died.

Justus O. Cole, of Boston, testifies that he had known the soldier about nine years, and that he worked for him (Mr. Cole) the most of that time, until within a day or two of his enlistment; and that, while in his employ, he was a perfectly healthy and rugged man; that he usually worked twelve hours a day without complaining of fatigue, or seeming to be injured by his labors; and that he never knew of his having the heart disease or any other disease, and that he considered him a remarkably sound and healthy man; that there is a great difference in him since he came out of the service; that he is weak and debilitated, and much thinner; that he observes a deep hollow in the left side near the heart, which did not exist before he enlisted.

Ira W. Jolie, of Boston, physician, testifies that he knew said Emery A. Blood, for several years previous to his enlistment; that he always considered him a remarkably sound and healthy man; that he had attended him several times for slight indispositions, such as any man at times is subject to; that in his opinion he never had the heart disease prior to his enlistment, but was free from all such diseases; that since he came out of the war there is a marked change in him; he is much thinner and weak, and has a deep hollow in his left side, near the heart, and that he knows that cavity did not exist prior to his enlistment; and he attributes the disease to a severe fall, which Mr. Blood is said to have had in Washington; and he regards him to be in a very enfeebled condition, and unable to gain a support by labor. This was taken December 11, 1862.

J. Malcom Graham, first lieutenant of said Company D, testifies that he saw Blood on his enlistment; that he was a perfectly sound and healthy man, with no appearance of disease; that he has personal knowledge of the accident which happened to him about July 5, 1861, when the company, being ordered to practice target-shooting, were on their way to the spot, and in going there the men were obliged to climb a high fence, and in doing so Blood fell and appeared to have been very much injured thereby, and fainted; and afterward (seven or eight days after) he fainted twice, at Shute's Hill, in Virginia, and after that was too weak to do military duty, and had a cavity in the left side, near the heart.

Blood himself testifies that previous to his enlistment he was a perfectly healthy man, and had no hollow in his side before he fell at Washington.

Doctor Adino B. Hall, of Boston, testifies that he visited Blood the day he died; that he found him prostrate from excessive vomiting and some purging; that from all he could learn of his disease, he should say his health had been impaired while in the United States service, from which he had never fully recovered; that his vital forces were not sufficient to sustain him under this attack; and that from all the facts he had learned, the man never had been well after he left the Army; and that the state of his physical system was such as to hasten death when attacked by acute disease; and that the injuries he received while in the service of the United States were the first cause of his illness, and the remote cause of his death.

On May 18, 1871, after the man was dead, and had been dead three years, the officer at the Pension Bureau certifies on Mr. Blood's case thus:

"In my judgment sufficient cause does not appear for rejection of claim.
"J. H. BASSETT."

Hence it appears that the Bureau rejected the soldier's claim during his life upon evidence which the same Bureau, by a new Commissioner, finds, after his death, entitled him to a pension; and the Bureau has rejected the claim of the widow, upon evidence which the committee think clearly entitles her to a pension, and the committee regard this an exceptional case. Wherefore they report the accompanying bill, granting a pension from the death of the husband, and recommend its passage

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

ANN M. BRACKETT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1449) granting a pension to Ann M. Brackett.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ann M. Brackett, widow, mother of John M. Brackett, late a private in Company F, Eighth Regiment Maine Volunteers, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Ann M. Brackett, for a pension, report:

That said Ann M. is the widow of Mark Brackett, who died in 1850; that the soldier, John M. Brackett, was the lawful son of said Ann M. and Mark, and he enlisted as a private in the Eighth Regiment Maine Volunteers, on the 27th day of August, 1861, for three years, or during the war, and was discharged at Hilton Head, June 23, 1862, for disability on account of tuberculosis and extreme debility, and died March 23, 1863. N. A. Herson, late surgeon Seventeenth Maine Volunteer Infantry, testifies that he was well acquainted with said John M. Brackett, late a private in Company F, Eighth Regiment Maine Volunteers, and that he came under his care professionally the next day after his arrival home from the United States Army, from which he had just been discharged on a surgeon's certificate of disability; that at that time he was suffering from chronic miasmatic diarrhea and tubercular consumption; and that, in his opinion, he contracted the disease while in the service, and in the line of his duty, and that he died of that disease March 14, 1863.

Doctor Terry Burts testifies that he was called to see him professionally a short time before his death, and that such was his disease.

Ex-Surgeon J. S. Ross verifies the standing of these two physicians.

Paul M. Fisher, surgeon, certifies in the discharge that the disease existed prior to enlistment; but he did not know him prior to enlistment. And in April, 1873, he says, in a letter, he cannot recollect anything about Brackett, and cannot swear to one thing about him.

Benjamin Williams, physician and surgeon, and attached to said Eighth Regiment Maine Volunteers as assistant surgeon, testifies that he well remembers said Brackett; that, so far as his knowledge extends, said Brackett was well enough when he enlisted, and that he had the diarrhea in consequence of his exposure in the Army.

His mother, the petitioner, testifies that he never had a physician, except in early childhood, and for diseases incident to that period of life; that he had no sickness after early childhood until he went to the war and came home an invalid. Letters written by him to his mother, while in the service, and before he was taken sick with this disease, show him to have been in perfect health. The evidence shows that he was a man of strictly temperate habits; that before he went to war he lived with his mother, and worked at shoemaking, and supported his mother; that after he went into the Army, he sent her money at different times, amounting to about $200; that the mother was poor, and dependent on him for support. She is still poor, and has not the means of support. He was never married. The mother, this petitioner, gave two sons to the country in the war of the rebellion, of whom this is one; and both died of disease contracted in the service. She applied for a pension, and her claim was rejected upon the ground that the soldier's disease was not contracted in the Army. The committee are of opinion that the evidence clearly proves that the disease was contracted in the service, while in the line of his duty; wherefore they report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

BETSIE LEWIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1905) granting a pension to Betsie Lewis.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Betsie Lewis, widow of the late Rodman Lewis, chaplain in the United States Navy, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 513) granting a pension to Betsie Lewis, widow of the late Rodman Lewis, chaplain of the United States Navy, respectfully report as follows:

The facts as set forth in the petition of the widow and substantiated by the statement of her neighbors, among whom are included Justice Balcom, of the supreme court of New York, the lieutenant-governor of the State, and other prominent citizens, and other evidence, are as follows:

Rev. Rodman Lewis served in the United States Navy as a chaplain for a period of thirty years, when he was honorably retired. He died in the year 1869, leaving a widow, the petitioner, Betsie Lewis, and one child, a daughter. His name stands recorded in the Navy Register of 1869 as "waiting orders." His only son died while serving his country in the Army, at Paducah, in 1862.

The widow is in advanced years, ill-health, and needy circumstances. As her husband was not on duty at the time of his death, the widow is not legally entitled to a pension, and has made no application heretofore for the same.

Your committee is of the opinion that this is a case where a pension should be granted, and do recommend that the bill be favorably reported to the House.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

ISAAC M. GRANT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1951) granting a pension to Isaac M. Grant.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isaac M. Grant, late of Company K, Thirty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Isaac M. Grant, late of Company K, Thirty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, having considered the same, submit the following report:

Isaac M. Grant was a member of Company K, Thirty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and while in the service, in camp and in the line of duty, he took cold, which settled in his eyes, entirely destroying the sight of his right eye, and impairing the sight of the other. His application was filed in the Pension Office about the 15th of May, 1866, but was not adjusted, because he could not find the whereabouts of the surgeon who treated him while in the service until the five years of limitation had expired, when it was rejected because it was not prosecuted to a successful termination within five years from the date of filing the same. Through the diligence of his attorney he has since found the surgeon, and secured his certificate of treatment, and is now, as the proofs show, clearly entitled to a pension. We therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

NANCY C. MARLETTE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1952) granting a pension to Nancy C. Marlette.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object.

Mr. NIBLACK. I hope not.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It relates to arrears of pension, and ought not to pass unless there is some explanation. I insist on my objection.

WILLIAM D. MORRISON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1953) granting a pension to William D. Morrison, late captain of Company D, Seventh Regiment Maryland Volunteer Infantry.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William D. Morrison, late captain of Company D, of the Seventh Regiment Maryland Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

It appears from the report, which was read, that William D. Morrison, late captain of Company D, Seventh Maryland Volunteer Infantry, was discharged January 17, 1865, having served from August 28, 1862; that while in the service, in the fall of 1862, he contracted diarrhea; that his discharge was necessitated by an injury he received by a railroad accident while traveling in the line of his duty.

The evidence is full and clear that he has ever since been suffering from the effect of the wound, in the right knee and left hip, received at the time of said railroad accident, aggravated by disease contracted in the service, rendering him unable to perform any labor, &c.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, placing said memorialist on the pension-rolls.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY B. RYDER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1954) granting a pension to Henry B. Ryder.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry B. Ryder, late second lieutenant in the Cameron Dragoons, afterward changed to the Fifth Pennsylvania Cavalry, and pay him a pension as second lieutenant from and after the passage of the act.

It appears from the report, which was read, that Henry B. Ryder, the applicant, entered the service of the United States as a second lieutenant in the Cameron Dragoons, afterward changed to the Fifth Pennsylvania Cavalry, in July, 1861. The evidence also shows that he failed to be mustered through no neglect of his own, and that when in the service several months, or about September, 1861, he was wounded while on the picket line in the night by a part of Colonel Baxter's regiment, who fired upon the picket line thinking they were the enemy. From the effects of the wound in the neck and typhoid fever the soldier had to undergo a most wonderful surgical operation, being the insertion of a silver tube into the trachea, which was inserted after tracheotomy, performed by the surgeons of Saint Luke's Hospital, New York City.

His treatment, as is shown by a copy of the record from the hospital, extended from November 28, 1861, to July 28, 1862; and many times during his treatment at the hospital, he being seized with fits of coughing, the tube had to be removed and the throat cleared by an operation of the surgeon.

The applicant now breathes through this tube, and, as the medical evidence shows, his life is in constant danger, and he requires constant medical treatment.

The facts as stated being sustained by abundant proof, and the service being shown by affidavits of his officers and others, the committee are unanimously of the opinion that the case is a meritorious one, and that the applicant should receive the pension due him.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN HENDERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1956) for the relief of John Henderson, of New Orleans.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. HOLMAN. That requires further explanation, and I object.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be passed over.

WILLARD DAVIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1956) for the relief of Willard Davis.

The bill was read.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be passed over.

ALONZO SNYDER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 261) for the relief of Alonzo Snyder, of Livingston County, New York.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Alonzo Snyder the sum of $250 for the costs and expenses incurred by him in defending certain actions for false imprisonment instituted against him by Donald Campbell, Daniel Mann, and George W. Randall, for and on account of the arrest of said parties in the years 1863 and 1864, by said Snyder, then acting as an officer of the Provost-Marshal-General's Department in and for the twenty-fifth district of New York.

It appears from the report, which was read, that Mr. Snyder was a special agent in the employ of the Provost-Marshal-General's Bureau from May, 1863, to April, 1865, in and for the twenty-fifth district of New York; that by the records of deserters arrested and correspondence on file in the Department, it also appears that the persons named in the petition of said Snyder for relief, to wit, Donald A. Campbell, Daniel D. Mann, and George W. Randall, were each and all arrested as deserters. And it further appears to the satisfaction of your committee, that such arrests were made by the petitioner, Alonzo Snyder, except the arrest of Campbell, and that Campbell's arrest was made by his orders. The records further show that said Campbell was discharged as having been "erroneously arrested;" that Daniel D. Mann was held to service; that George W. Randall had already been discharged from service of the United States, and was erroneously reported to said Snyder as a deserter, but that Snyder had no knowledge thereof. Your committee further find that each of said persons commenced an action against said Snyder for false imprisonment; that the suits brought by Campbell and Mann have never been prosecuted, but were abandoned after the defendant had retained counsel and appeared therein, but that the action brought by Randall was prosecuted to a judgment, and that the petitioner obtained a judgment against Randall for his costs, which judgment has never been paid, and is worthless; that in the defense of these several suits, the said Alonzo Snyder has paid or incurred considerable expense, amounting in the aggregate to $250, and that he has never, in any manner, been paid therefor; that the Adjutant-General, in his report upon the case made at the request of the committee, says: "As the petitioner was an officer of the United States * * * and the arrest was made in good faith, upon information obtained through the regular channels, it is thought that the petitioner, Alonzo Snyder, is entitled to be reimbursed by the United States for such expenses connected with the said suit as were properly and necessarily incurred;" that in the opinion of the committee the whole of said expenses, amounting to $250, were properly and necessarily incurred in the defense of said suits, and that said Alonzo Snyder should be paid therefor.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. RUSK. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ORTH reported that the Committee of the Whole House had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report sundry bills to the House, with the recommendation they do pass.

SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move by unanimous consent that to-morrow's session be set apart for debate only. I do this at the request of several members who desire to be heard, and who may not have another opportunity.

Mr. MAYNARD. I must object to that.

Mr. NIBLACK. I hope there will be no objection. There are several gentlemen upon the floor who desire to be heard. I do not desire to speak myself, and merely make the motion in their behalf.

Mr. McKEE. I think it is better we should have a session to-morrow for debate than adjourn over until Monday next.

Mr. MAYNARD. I insist on my objection.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. SHANKS. I desire to enter a privileged motion, not for consideration now, but merely to have it entered so it may be considered hereafter. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 825) for the free distribution of documents and seeds was rejected, and I give notice I will call it up after the morning hour on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

GEORGIA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—RAWLS vs. SLOAN.

Mr. HYDE. I am directed by the Committee on Elections to submit a report in the case of Rawls vs. Sloan, from the first congressional district of Georgia. I move the report be laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed. I give notice I will call it up for action at an early day. I ask the Clerk to read the resolutions at the end of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. MORGAN RAWLS is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the first congressional district of Georgia in the Forty-third Congress.

Resolved, That Hon. Andrew Sloan is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the first congressional district of Georgia in the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. SPEER. I submit a report in behalf of the minority of the Committee on Elections; and I move it be printed with the report of the majority.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution of the minority.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. MORGAN RAWLS, the sitting member, was duly elected and is entitled to the seat occupied by him in this House as the Representative from the first congressional district of Georgia, in the Forty-third Congress.

The reports were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HYDE. I give notice to the House I will call up this case at an early day.

MINING STATISTICS.

Mr. McCORMICK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That of the report of R. W. Raymond on mining statistics, with the accompanying engravings, there be printed three thousand copies for the House, two thousand for the Senate, one thousand for the Treasury Department, and one thousand for the commissioner.

MRS. ELIZABETH COON.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2222) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Coon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 38.

Mr. MAYNARD. I demand the yeas and nays. We have had already one holiday during this week.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The motion to adjourn is not debatable, and I object to debate.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 130.

Mr. MAYNARD. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, one-fifth of those present not having voted in the affirmative.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. NIBLACK. I now ask unanimous consent that we have a session to-morrow for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. BECK. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I withdraw the objection to the House meeting to-morrow for debate only.

Mr. BECK. Then I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. PAGE. I renew the objection to a session to-morrow for debate.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to—ayes 12, noes not counted.

Mr. PAGE. I withdraw my objection to a session to-morrow for debate.

Mr. CROOKE. I renew it.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, without amendment, were severally read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1776) for the relief of George Yount, late second lieutenant Company I, Third Missouri Volunteer Infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 1948) granting a pension to Mary J. Blood;

A bill (H. R. No. 1949) granting a pension to Ann M. Brackett;

A bill (H. R. No. 1950) granting a pension to Betsie Lewis;

A bill (H. R. No. 1951) granting a pension to Isaac M. Grant;

A bill (H. R. No. 1953) granting a pension to William D. Morrison, late captain of Company D, Seventh Regiment Maryland Volunteer Infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 1954) granting a pension to Henry B. Ryder; and

A bill (H. R. No. 961) for the relief of Alonzo Snyder, of Livingston County, New York.

MATTHEW WOODRUFF.

The bill (H. R. No. 1777) for the relief of Matthew Woodruff, of Clarke County, Missouri, late first sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, from the charge of desertion, and to grant him an honorable discharge from the service, &c., was reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. DONNAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. No. 365, which is equivalent in terms to House bill No. 1777, and that it be substituted for the House bill. It has been reported favorably by the Committee on Militar Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill which the gentleman from Iowa desires to substitute for the House bill will be read.

The Senate bill was read, as follows:

A bill for the relief of Matthew Woodruff, late first sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteers.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the record so as to honorably muster out and discharge Matthew Woodruff, late first sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteers, and that the said Matthew Woodruff be allowed such pay, bounty, and allowances as he would have been entitled to receive but for the record of his alleged desertion, deducting therefrom pay for absence of twenty-six days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the Senate bill which has been read being substituted for the House bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of bill S. No. 365, and the same was read the third time, and passed; and bill H. R. No. 1777 was laid upon the table.

SIMEON J. THOMPSON.

The bill (H. R. No. 133) for the relief of Simeon J. Thompson, late an acting second lieutenant of Company B, Seventy-ninth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, was reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, with the recommendation that it do not pass.

The report of the committee was agreed to, and the bill was laid upon the table.

WILLIAM H. EDWARDS.

The bill (H. R. No. 1445) to reinstate William H. Edwards on the pension-roll was reported by the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, with the following amendments:

Strike out these words:

"The Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reinstate upon the pension-roll, the name of William H. Edwards, late of Company —, Fourth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate now allowed by law."

And insert in lieu thereof as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William H. Edwards, late a sergeant in Company I, Fourth Tennessee Cavalry, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

Amend the title so as to read, "A bill granting a pension to William H. Edwards."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the several votes by which bills reported to-day from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had been passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROBERT F. WINSLOW.

Mr. MELLISH, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2223) for the relief of Robert F. Winslow; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2076) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue the use of the cutter Relief as a revenue-cutter, and use said vessel for a boarding-station in Mobile Bay;

An act (H. R. No. 1920) to amend the fifteenth section of the act approved June 8, 1872, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department;" and

An act (H. R. No. 1335) to grant an American register to the Canadian schooner George Warren.

PENITENTIARY IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter and papers from the Department of Justice, relating to the penitentiary in Washington Territory; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PURMAN, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for two weeks.

POST-ROUTES IN GEORGIA.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House certain petitions for the establishment of post-routes in Georgia.

HIRAM A. BENEFIELD.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Hiram A. Benefield, Company C, Fifty-ninth Indiana Volunteers.

CUSTOMS DUTIES ON IMPORTED FRUITS.

On motion of Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 2191) in relation to the customs duties on imported fruits, with an amendment by the Senate, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS IN LARGE CITIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House testimony taken before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post Roads, in relation to the salaries of postmasters in large cities; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

SESSION ON SATURDAY.

Mr. NIBLACK. I hope the objection to setting apart the session to-morrow for debate only will not be persisted in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana renews the request that there be a session to-morrow for debate only, the House to meet as in Committee of the Whole, and no business whatever to be transacted. Is there objection?

Mr. CROOKE. There is, sir; to be maintained throughout. [Laughter.]

Mr. NIBLACK. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to adjourn over till Monday.

The question being taken on the motion to reconsider, there were—ayes 82, noes, 28; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. NIBLACK, and Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 107, noes 45.

So the House agreed to reconsider the vote.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs, will the House, when it adjourns to-day, adjourn to meet on Monday next?

The question being put, there were—ayes 54, noes 88.

So the House refused to adjourn over.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ALBERT: The petition of John G. Taylor, collector of customs and disbursing agent of the Treasury Department for the district of Annapolis, Maryland, to be refunded the sum of money as salary paid in error to John R. Briscoe, surveyor of customs at the port of Nottingham, in said district, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BURROWS: The petition of 600 soldiers of the State of Michigan, for the equalization of bounties and increase of pensions, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CHAFFEE: The remonstrance of citizens of Pueblo, Colorado, against authorizing said city to purchase a portion of a certain school section for a public park, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, the petition of the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Good Templers of Colorado, for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CLAYTON: The remonstrance of Painter & Co., of San Francisco, California, against admitting printers' type free of duty, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 28, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday—Friday, February 27—I am reported as having stated, when the test vote was being taken on bill No. 825, regulating the transmission of public documents, that my colleague, Mr. STORM, would, if present, vote for the bill as a whole. This is an error, and does my colleague, Mr. STORM, great injustice. What I did state, and that most clearly, was that "my colleague, Mr. STORM, who was unavoidably absent in Pennsylvania, would, if present, vote against the bill as a whole, although he would have voted for the third section had the opportunity been afforded him."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Saturday, the first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature. The morning hour begins at twenty-five minutes past twelve o'clock.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move that the House now adjourn. I will state that my object in making this motion is in order to secure a session to-day for debate only, as there are several members here who desire to submit remarks upon various subjects.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are a number of committees who desire to be called for reports of a private nature. After they have submitted their reports, the Chair will recognize the gentleman to submit his motion.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and it was not agreed to.

WILLIAM B. HALE.

Mr. SMART, from the Committee on Patents, reported adversely upon the bill (H. R. No. 1647) to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to receive and entertain an application of William Beale Hale for letters-patent; which was laid on the table, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

M'CLINTOCK YOUNG.

Mr. SMART also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 555) for the relief of McClintock Young, of the State of Maryland.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that the extension of the patent of McClintock

Young, of Frederick City, in the State of Maryland, for an improvement in harvesting-machines, dated June 28, 1873, and numbered 24598, and signed by the Commissioner of Patents on June 28, 1873, shall have the same binding effect in law as though said extension had been signed by the Commissioner, to bear date of June 27, 1873.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read. It states that McClintock Young took out a patent for improvement in harvesting-machines on June 28, 1859; that under existing laws he was entitled to a renewal of his patent, which renewal was issued to him with date of June 28, 1873; that the validity of the extension is questioned on the ground that the original patent expired June 27, 1873, and that the extension should have been made a day earlier; that the fault is with the Commissioner if this interpretation be correct, as the application was made six months before the expiration of the original term of the patent; and the bill reported is to remove all doubts and to confirm the validity of the extension.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I would like to hear some explanation showing the necessity for this bill.

Mr. SMART. The state of the case is this: this patentee applied for his extension six months before the expiration of his patent. On the 27th of June, 1873, the attention of the acting Commissioner of Patents was called to the matter, and he decided to await the return of the Commissioner, which took place the next day; and the extension was issued, bearing date June 28, 1873. There have been four decisions of the courts, holding that in construing a patent the day of date is excluded. There is an opinion of Chief Justice Chase bearing the other way. The patentee in this case is clearly entitled to his extension under existing laws.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. For whose benefit is this extension?

Mr. SMART. For the benefit of the patentee.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Has he not assigned it to other parties?

Mr. SMART. He assigned the original patent to Mr. McCormick for $10,000, and has agreed to assign the extension for $5,000. In a letter which was before the committee, the Commissioner of Patents states that if there is any error in the case, it is his error. I have not the letter with me.

Mr. LOWNDES. I have the letter here, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1874.

DEAR SIR: I read your letter and the opinion of the attorney as to the validity of your extension, and hope you may get the act ratifying your extension as you desire; yet I have no doubt whatever but your extension is perfectly good just as it is, and that you can collect by law the price agreed to be paid for your assignment.

I think Mr. Baldwin is clearly wrong in his opinion. The courts have held in patent cases that, in determining the date of the expiration of a patent, the day of date is excluded. Your patent bore date June 28, 1859, consequently the whole of June 28, 1873, was included in the original term of the patent; and the extension granted on the 28th was granted before the expiration of the original patent. Of this I have not a shadow of doubt. I could refer you to the court decisions, but am writing at my house, and my court reports are at my office. The question is well settled.

Very respectfully,

M. D. LEGGETT,
Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. MCCLINTOCK YOUNG.

Mr. SMART. This young man, the patentee, applied for and obtained a patent bearing date January 28, 1859. Six months before the expiration of the patent he applied for an extension, to which he was entitled under existing law. The case lay in the Patent Office until the 27th of June, 1873, when the attention of the acting Commissioner was called to it, and a suggestion made that it was necessary to issue the extension on the 27th of June. He held that that was not necessary, and determined to await the return of the Commissioner. The Commissioner returned the next day, and signed the extension on the 28th of June, 1873. If it is held that the first day of the original patent is to be counted, then the patent expired before the extension was granted; if the first day is not to be counted, then the extension is valid. There is no decision of the Supreme Court upon the point, but there are four decisions of United States courts to the effect that the first day is not counted.

In this case the extension has been sold to McCormick for $5,000.

Mr. LUTTRELL. If this is a question of law, why cannot it be decided by the courts, without calling upon Congress to intervene?

Mr. SMART. If the Supreme Court should hold that this extension is not valid, then, through an error of the Patent Office, this patentee is deprived of his right under the existing law.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I think it is well enough to let the Supreme Court pass upon that question before Congress shall interfere. We have courts for the purpose of determining such questions; and I hope that this proposition will not be pressed.

Mr. SMART. If the courts should decide adversely as to the validity of this extension, what will become of this patentee and his rights under the existing law? It is now clearly the duty of Congress to correct the error of the Commissioner. It is the Commissioner that has been in error, not the party applying for relief. This party has rights under the law; and if the Supreme Court should decide against the validity of the extension, he will have lost his standing entirely. I think we ought not to do injustice to this patentee for the mere purpose of getting the opinion of the Supreme Court on a question of this sort.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. As I understand, this bill is for the relief of Mr. McCormick.

Mr. SMALL. It is for the relief of the patentee.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I understood the gentleman to say that the patent had been sold to Mr. McCormick for $5,000.

Mr. SMART. But there has been no payment made, because of the doubt as to the validity of the extension.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, on the behalf of the Committee on Patents, I desire to say that we do not propose to recommend to this House the passage of any bill whatever which the common judgment of the members here shall not deem to be right and just as between the patentee and the people of the United States. We have already in our committee unanimously decided not to recommend the extension of any patent whatever by direct congressional action; that, if any recommendation with reference to an extension is made by our committee, it shall be a recommendation to enable the Commissioner to examine the matter under such limitations and restrictions as Congress shall impose. We propose that patents, if extended at all, shall be extended in this manner; not by the arbitrary decision of Congress upon the particular case. That is one point gained, as we believe, in favor both of the just rights of inventors, and of the great mass of the people who may purchase and use their inventions.

We have also determined not to recommend even the passage of such an enabling act, unless an equitable case be presented, and unless the interests of the inventor and of the people harmonize. We have determined not to recommend an enabling act for the extension of any patent except where it is warranted by the same rules that would apply to an application for a new trial in cases before a court, or where the equities are with the inventor, and where, as we believe, the common judgment of the members of the House will sanction the action we recommend.

Now, sir, I make those remarks in advance, in behalf of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, in order that members of the House may understand that, in making any recommendation for an extension, or anything else in regard to patents, we recognize all those great principles of protection to the public interests—agricultural, manufacturing, and industrial—which are prominent in the mind of every member of the House. I desire to disabuse the minds of members from the idea which, from the questions put to me here, seems to be prevalent, that this committee is to be the machinery and the tool through which extensions shall be improperly given to inventors or patentees or monopolies. I trust that, when members shall have become acquainted with the manner in which the Committee on Patents examine these subjects and the principles upon which we recommend action by the House, they will be satisfied with our disposition of these questions, or will, at least, give a reasonable and fair hearing to any recommendation which this committee may make. It is my view, and also the unanimous view of the committee, that we should be governed in our recommendations to the House by the principles I have indicated.

Now, sir, what is this case? And I wish gentlemen might hear me, for I do not often ask their attention, and I would not now except to explain, in advance, some of the reasons which will influence the committee in their recommendations to the House. I wish, too, that the prejudice against the extension of patents may not be so powerful with some members as to prevent them from withdrawing their attention from private conversation while I attempt to explain the grounds on which the committee propose to act; and it makes but little difference how soon they may give me attention, because, as some of the older members know, I can stand here an hour but that I shall have an opportunity to explain my views.

What is this case? Under the patent law, as it existed at the time this application for an extension was granted, a patentee who had received his patent for fourteen years had the right, without any further legislation, to make his application for an extension six months in advance of the expiration of the patent, and as a matter of course the patent was renewed under the law if the proper requirements and conditions were fulfilled. That was the right of the patentee under the old law. That law has since been changed; and patents are now granted for the term of seventeen years, without any right of extension. This was the common judgment of Congress when the law of 1872 was passed. In this case the application was made under the old law. The patent had run the usual term of fourteen years. At the end of that term the patentee, under the law then in force, had the right to apply for an extension; and, in accordance with the requirement of the law, McClintock Young, six months before the expiration of the patent, made an application for an extension to himself; and all the rights accrued to the inventor. That was the object of the law granting the extension, that although the patent was valuable and may have been sold for nothing—for a trifle, to the assignee—yet the extension should inure to the benefit of the inventor; that those who had made valuable inventions and given them away, almost, to get them into use might have the second term for their own benefit.

Mr. BURCHARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONGER. I cannot hear what the gentleman says, there is so much conversation right at my other ear. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURCHARD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Michigan whether there is any discretion with the Commissioner in regard to the seven-year extension at the end of the fourteen years, or must he give the extension, on application being made for it?

Mr. CONGER. Under the present law there is no extension allowed whatever. Under the old law it was contemplated there should be fourteen years at least, as the limitation of the first patent; but it was granted for fourteen years, and then, if the patent was sold to any company, or there was any assignee of the patent, the extension was granted to the inventor, that is, that it should return to him again and the right of the invention inure to his profit; that there might then be a new sale to somebody else; and it was granted for the benefit of the inventor under the old law.

Mr. BURCHARD. That is, that it was granted for the benefit of the inventor for another seven years?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir; for another seven years.

Mr. BURCHARD. At the expiration of the first fourteen years?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; the extension was to be at the end of the first fourteen years.

Mr. BURCHARD. I understand, then, that this extension of patent was for ten years, after the first fourteen?

Mr. CONGER. This extension was, under the old law, after the first patent for a second term of seven years.

Mr. BURCHARD. I want to see whether I understand the gentleman from Michigan correctly.

Mr. CONGER. Under the old law the right of extension existed.

Mr. BURCHARD. I wish to ask this question: Was there under the old law any discretion allowed to the Commissioner as to the extension, or was he compelled to grant it at the expiration of seven years? Was he compelled to grant an extension for seven years, or had he discretion in the matter?

Mr. CONGER. I will answer the gentleman's question. Under the law granting extension at the end of fourteen years, the Commissioner was required to examine the receipts, the profits, the amount the public had paid for it, the amount the inventor had received himself, and then he was to judge whether there had been received through the inventor or by his assignee sufficient compensation. The Commissioner was also to inquire whether there had been paid by the public such an amount as would be considered, over and above the expenses of bringing the patent into notice, such an amount as was in his judgment fair remuneration to the inventor for the use and value of his patent.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Michigan tell the House what machine he refers to?

Mr. CONGER. It does not refer to any machine, but to an improvement in harvesters.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. What improvement is it?

Mr. CONGER. It can be applied to most of the harvesting machines. It is applied to the McCormick reaper. This new extension, after it was granted by the Commissioner of Patents, subject to the limitations I have stated, was contracted to McCormick for the term of seven years for $5,000, which went to the inventor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This invention, then, is being used in the manufacture of the McCormick harvesting machines?

Mr. CONGER. I suppose it is.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Suppose the bill does not pass, what, then, will be the consequence?

Mr. CONGER. It will be left subject to litigation between whomsoever it may concern, between McCormick and the inventor, whether the patent is valid or is not valid.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is the original inventor who seeks this legislation to suffer, or are the owners of the McCormick reaper to suffer?

Mr. CONGER. If it be decided that this patent is invalid, then the inventor will lose all benefit of the extension which he procured from the Patent Office.

Mr. BURCHARD. So, then, any other manufacturer of reapers can use this invention?

Mr. CONGER. That is subject to litigation.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I merely desire to say that if there is one thing in legislation we ought to be careful of it is in reference to the extension of patents for harvesters, and especially in reference to the extension of a patent for the McCormick machine. There is no machine in the West owned by any company which has paid so much profit on the sale of the machines as this McCormick reaper. In my judgment, this is exceedingly dangerous legislation; and unless the gentleman can show conclusively that by the failure of this legislation some right of some individual will be lost that would otherwise be enjoyed by some large corporation, I am not disposed to vote for it.

Mr. CONGER. I yielded for a question and not for a speech; but I do not regret it, because the gentleman has expressed my sentiments in more beautiful language than I could myself, and it was in furtherance of my object that I permitted him to go on.

Now, I had endeavored to show the House that it was not the intention of the Committee on Patents to recommend any matter for the consideration of the House as to which they did not believe the judgment of every member of the House, in regard to its right and equity, would accord with that of the committee. I had said that before the gentleman spoke.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CONGER. Certainly.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMART] to say that there were lawsuits now pending, and that there had been four decisions.

Mr. SMART. What I said was that there had been four decisions bearing on this point, whether the first day and the last day were counted in making up the term of fourteen years. The effect of these decisions in inferior courts is that the extension is now valid, and that is the opinion of the Commissioner.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Allow me to ask a question there. The gentleman now says that he meant that those four decisions had been made in regard to other patents. The question I have to ask the gentleman is, whether there are any suits now pending relative to this patent?

Mr. CONGER. I believe not.

Briefly, then, as has been stated by my colleague to the committee, this is the condition of this case: The inventor of this improvement, under the law, made his application within the time prescribed by law for the extension which the law would grant him, subject to the decision of the Commissioner. It lay in the Patent Office until the last day of the extension, as some claim, the 27th, when, the Commissioner being absent, the acting Commissioner was asked to grant the extension, as it had been decided it should be granted. But he thought, as the Commissioner would return the next day, the 28th, and as he supposed that day was within the time of the expiration of the patent according to law, he would postpone the decision until the return of the Commissioner. The next day, which was the 28th, the Commissioner returned and signed the extension. The extension was granted, and the only question remaining unsettled about it is, whether that extension ought to have issued on the 27th, or whether it is sufficiently legal that it issued on the 28th. If there is a failure about it, it is owing to the action of an officer of this Government in deciding that it might as well be issued on the 28th. There have been some decisions of the courts as to the question of time, but not in this case; for there are no suits pending in this case that I know of.

Mr. BURCHARD. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CONGER. I am a timid man, and these interruptions might confuse me. [Laughter.]

It is to avoid litigation; it is to enable this inventor, who has never yet received anything valuable at all for his improvement, to receive the $5,000 for which he has contracted to be paid to himself for his invention, that legislation is sought here. It is merely to confirm and legalize the date, which involves the difference of one day. The committee thought it was very proper that this should be settled by an act of Congress, rather than it should be a subject of litigation between those who purchased the machine, those who used it, those who manufactured it, and the inventor, who desires to reap a little profit from his invention.

Mr. BURCHARD. Will the gentleman now allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CONGER. I yield to the gentleman now for that purpose.

Mr. BURCHARD. The only effect of our legislation, if we pass this bill, is, as I understand it, to extend the patent if it has not been already extended. If the date—the 28th of June, I think it was—is sufficient, the party already has an extension.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURCHARD. If it is not sufficient, this act extends this patent for seven years. Now, I have heard very able speeches made by members of this committee against an extension, and I heartily applaud and approve of the position taken by the chairman in regard to that. I have not noticed in this report any reasons why the Commissioner should have extended the patent. We are called upon here by our legislation to extend this patent only because the Commissioner intended to extend it. If we do anything at all, it will be merely to extend the patent, and without knowing any reason why we should extend it. There is no such reason presented in the report except that the Commissioner has decided upon the proof. Under these circumstances, I am not ready to vote for an extension without further information.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] allow me to inquire of him——

Mr. CONGER. Allow me to answer the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.] The gentleman mistakes somewhat the effect of our proposed action here. It is not to extend the patent. That was the original proposition coming before the committee; but, as I have already said, the committee would not ask the action of the House upon that. The gentleman must not mislead the House by his proposition. He cannot very well mislead me.

Mr. BURCHARD. I shall not undertake to do that.

Mr. CONGER. I presume not.

Mr. BURCHARD. That would be impossible. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. But if this subject is to be open to litigation for the four or four and a half years of the remaining life of this patent, it is open to litigation against every farmer who has got it. It is open to litigation against every manufacturer that makes it and every farmer that uses it. It is open to litigation between the inventor, seeking to secure the price for which he has sold it, and his assignee.

The committee believe that, outside of the rights of the inventor and of the manufacturer, the interest of the public would be benefited by obtaining a decision of Congress whether or not this was a legal extension, before large sums of money were spent in litigation, and before the whole farming community which might buy and might use this patent should be brought into a litigation that may arise hereafter, (I believe none has yet arisen,) in regard to the effect caused by the carelessness or negligence of an officer of this Government. The propriety of the extension appears from the report of the Commissioner that the patentee had himself never received any substantial benefit for his improvement.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Is this for the benefit of the inventor?

Mr. CONGER. It is.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Do you not propose merely to give the inventor an opportunity to obtain $5,000, while you grant a monopoly to McCormick for seven years?

Mr. CONGER. I do not allow the gentleman to put it in that position even; I desire to hold him to the strict fact of the case, which is this: An officer of this Government, by carelessness or neglect, failed to act, as he intended to act, within the time the law required him to act, as some suppose. The law required him to accept or reject the application for extension. By the files of the office he did accept the proposition, and ordered an extension; but the paper was not signed until the 28th of June. Now, by the neglect of your officer the signing of the papers was delayed until a day when it was rendered a little uncertain whether the extension is valid.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Suppose Congress was called upon to accept or reject this application for extension; undoubtedly, owing to the new law, we would reject it. Now, you want us to step in and help extend this monopoly for seven years, when if the request had been made of Congress to extend it, we unquestionably would not have done it.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman cannot have read the law on that subject, because the very law which limited patents to seventeen years without any extension, also provided that there should be two years granted after the passage of the law, in which applications for extensions of old patents might be made under the old law. That time expired last fall. Congress then did not evidently intend, by the passage of a law granting all patents for seventeen years, to affect patents already granted, because in the same law two years were given to patentees under the old law to apply for extensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. How long has this patent run?

Mr. CONGER. It has run for fourteen years since the first grant; I said seven years by mistake.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object to the passage of this bill, according to the gentleman's own showing; and my reasons are these: In the first place he says it is for the benefit of the inventor, who will receive $5,000. I do not object to the inventor obtaining $5,000, but I do object to extending this monopoly for seven years at the expense of the farmers of this country. I hope, therefore, that the bill will not pass.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman on my left, [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa,] has presented a very specious view of this case. I cannot understand how he, or any other gentleman who has expressed the same view, can reconcile it with his conscience and with his sense of what is right. As I understand, the Constitution providing that Congress might reward inventors by securing to them for a limited period the fruits of their inventions, Congress enacted that when it was found by a judicial inquiry by the Commissioner of Patents that the inventor had not received adequate compensation in the first fourteen years, the patent might be renewed for seven years longer. That was a judicial investigation and inquiry about a fact. If that fact is found to be true, then the patent for the invention is just as much that man's property under the law as a farm of any constituent of the gentleman is his property under the law. Now, there are men who think it is not right that men should own farms, who say that it is a monopoly for one man to take possession of one acre or ten acres of this earth's surface which he has improved, and keep out his fellow-man who would like to divide with him. But I suppose any gentleman on this floor, whatever he may think of the wisdom of these laws, would scorn to undertake to declare judicially that a fact is true when it is not true, or to undertake to declare judicially that a fact is not true when he knows it is true.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] says that if this application had come to us at the time for an extension, we would not have granted it, and therefore we should not grant it now. Does the gentleman mean to say, that if the question was submitted to us to declare that the expenses of this man had been paid, by his patent, that he had been fully compensated, and we had found that he had not been—does he mean that in that case we would turn upon the man and say "We will state falsely a fact and deprive you of what is your legal property, because we do not agree to the expediency of the law under which you obtained it?"

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In that case I would likely have found that there was no question but what McCormick had been fully compensated.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. This is not a question of the McCormick machine.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is the question you put to me.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. No, sir; it is a question whether a poor man, who invented an improvement in that machine, and who has not received compensation for it, shall now be paid by McCormick $5,000 for the right to use that improvement, or whether he shall be deprived of this compensation because the Commissioner of Patents accidentally put off one day too long the signing of a paper in his office.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I say that there is no machine the patentees or owners of which have been better remunerated than the owners of the McCormick machine.

Mr. G. F. HOAR, I do not know anything about them.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think that is so.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not yield further, Mr. Speaker. I never heard of this case before to-day. I take the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Patents, [Mr. CONGER,] a Representative from the agricultural Northwest, who does not like patents, who does not like these monopolies, as he calls them, any better than anybody else does. He comes before the House and says, "Though I do not like patents, though I do not like monopolies, I say that this poor man is entitled to this $5,000; it is his legal property under the law; and opposed as I am to patent monopolies, opposed as I am to their extension for the future, I am not going to be base enough to cheat a poor man out of his property because I do not like the law under which he gains it, or because I want to go home and advertise myself somewhere as having attacked these patent monopolies."

Mr. Speaker, as the principle of our patent laws has been referred to in this discussion, I want to say one word upon that point. The men who make these inventions in agricultural implements, or anything else, are, as a rule, among the hardest-working, the most self-denying, the most unfortunate, the most poorly-paid class of American citizens. The lines which Dr. Johnson wrote in regard to the poet might, with the change of a word, be applied to the inventors of this country:

> But ah! what ills the inventor's life assail—
> Toil, envy, want; the law-suit and the jail.

The profits of the inventors' labors are shared by the wealthy men like Mr. McCormick, and by the people of the country whose prosperity these inventors increase. Eli Whitney largely multiplied, according to the confession of one of the leading citizens of the South, the value of every acre of cotton-producing land in this country; yet when he went down South to claim under the law the benefit of his invention as a reward for that gift of millions and millions to the people of America, the juries in the Southern States would not find that a single cotton-gin was in use in the entire South, though on the summer days when those trials were going on, you could hear the noise of those machines under the very windows of the room where the jury was sitting.

Now, sir, the inventors of these agricultural implements are generally men in humble life. The inventor in these cases is not the wealthy manufacturer, not the man who takes the assignment, but the working man, applying himself at noon-time, and in the evenings, to perfect his invention. He is the man of genius, often shiftless, improvident, unhandy. And when, as in this case, the reward is to go to him, why should he not be heard when he asks that a little division of the gain—not a monopoly, not a tax, but a small part of the uncounted gain which he is making for the agricultural interests of the country—should be accorded him as a reward?

I tell my friends from the Northwest that they are in error in this matter. We of New England have no interest distinct from theirs on this subject. The one thing which New England wants is a prosperous West. On that, mainly, her own prosperity and that of her people depend. She wants a prosperous, growing, wealthy West. Now, if you choose to stop the influx or skilled labor from Great Britain and Europe, to stop the immigration from across the Atlantic, you keep there the laborers, the inventors, the manufacturers of the world. What is the result? You must raise your raw material, your wool, your cotton, your iron, your leather; and then these products must be carried two thousand miles by land and three thousand miles by sea to the men who make those materials into coats, shoes, hats, cloth, and other articles that you need. Thus the workman on the one side, and the farmer of the Northwest on the other, must divide the cost of this transportation of thousands of miles by sea and thousands of miles by land; and that is to be an eternal and inevitable tax on the agricultural industries which gentlemen of the West represent. What you need to do is to say to those skilled workmen across the Atlantic, "Come over here; plant yourselves close by us at our doors; when we have spent a day in raising a bushel of wheat, and you have spent a day in making a shoe, let us exchange the shoe and the bushel of wheat, without spending 90 per cent. of the entire value of both in paying the shipper of New York, in paying the railroad owner of England and Germany, to carry our products six thousand or eight thousand miles in order to make the exchange, thereby keeping us both poor, so that the northwestern farmer burns his corn to keep himself warm, while the English factory hand, the English inventor, the English skilled workman, starves in his hovel."

You are mistaken in this policy; but, whether mistaken or not, you are entitled to act upon it; but, in Heaven's name, act upon it frankly. Repeal the patent law, destroy it, but do not cut the poor inventor out of the $5,000 which, under the law, is his, just as your constituent's farm is his, because you do not like the law.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts, before taking his seat, allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have been personally attacked by the gentleman from Massachusetts; and I wish an opportunity to be heard before this discussion goes any farther.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he will allow me to do so.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I am not aware that I attacked the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understood the gentleman to attack me personally. He said my effort to draw out the truth relative to this extension was made with the view to advertise myself.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I did not allude to the gentleman at all in any word I said.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am glad to hear the gentleman say so, for I was under the impression he referred to me, as I was the only member from Iowa who spoke on the subject.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman I alluded to was his colleague, [Mr. KASSON,] who made the explanation to which I referred, in the seat behind me.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon, then, for my misunderstanding. I was not aware my colleague [Mr. KASSON] had said anything on the subject.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The argument to which I addressed myself in reply was the argument of the gentleman in front of me.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My colleague [Mr. KASSON] had not taken the floor.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I did not intend any personal disrespect to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let me ask the gentleman who has charge of this bill for two or three minutes.

Mr. SMART. Does the gentleman wish to speak to this bill, or go into a general discussion of the patent law? I am perfectly willing to yield my time to the discussion of the bill itself; but if I allow gentlemen to enter into a general discussion of the merits of the patent law, there will be no end of the matter.

The simple question before us is, whether we shall correct the error of an officer of the Government or not. There is no question before us on the validity of the law. The law stands just as it was before. The officer to whom was assigned this duty has committed an error. Shall we correct it or not? Shall we go to work and promptly rectify that error and give this patentee the benefit of his patent, or shall we refuse to do it? At any proper time I am willing to go into a general discussion, if that be necessary, whether patent laws are advisable or not. But because we do not believe in patent laws, shall we refuse to correct an error not through any fault of the inventor, but made by an officer of the Government?

I will yield now for five minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. EAMES.]

Mr. EAMES. I think that there must be some misapprehension of the facts of this case on the part of the House, if there is any member disposed to vote against the bill reported by the committee. Until the 2d day of March, 1861, the patent law of the United States limited the term to fourteen years. By the act of March 2, 1861, the term was limited to seventeen years, but with a right on the part of the patentee, if the patent was granted prior to that date, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension for a further term of seven years.

It appears from statements made in this discussion that this patent was for an improvement of the McCormick reaper. It was issued originally on the 28th of June, 1859. Under the law then in force it expired in fourteen years from its date.

In order to obtain an extension of this patent it was necessary for the patentee to make his application in writing to the Commissioner not more than six months, nor less than ninety days, before the expiration of the original term of the patent; and no extension could be granted after the original term had expired.

The only question which arises in this case is simply whether the 28th of June, 1873, is the date of the expiration of the original patent. There is no other question arising here.

Now, sir, in order to obtain an extension of a patent it is not only necessary that the application should be made not more than six months, nor less than ninety days, before the expiration of the original term and the fees prescribed by law be paid, but the applicant is bound to make a complete case upon the merits before the extension is granted. There is nothing in the law compelling the Commissioner of Patents to allow a patent to issue for an additional term of seven years. It is only after a full hearing upon the merits, and a careful examination of the facts of the case, that the Commissioner directs an extension for a further term of seven years. The rules of the Patent Office require the Commissioner in every case of that kind to make an examination, in the first place, upon the following questions:

First, was the invention new and useful when patented?

Second. Is it valuable and important to the public, and to what extent?

Third. Has the inventor been reasonably remunerated for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed upon it, and the introduction of it into use? If not, has his failure to be so remunerated arisen from neglect or fault on his part?

Fourth. What will be the effect of the proposed extension upon the public interest?

These distinct questions are to be determined by the evidence; and it is only when the facts in evidence before the Commissioner establish these points and satisfy him that there has not been a proper remuneration to the inventor during the original term, that he directs the patent to be extended.

Now, the only point there is here is simply this: Whether the patentee in this case shall be deprived of the benefit of an extension granted him under the law, after a full hearing of the merits of his case, simply because the certificate of extension was signed by the Commissioner on the 28th of June, 1873, instead of being signed on or before midnight on the 27th of June, 1873. And it seems to me there is no member of this House, whatever may be his views in relation to the patent laws or the policy of the patent laws; whether he may consider them as being beneficial to the country or an injury to the country; that there is no fair-minded member of this House who, in a case like this, will say that the applicant is not entitled to the relief he asks.

Mr. SMART. I now call the previous question. I will state that there are several gentlemen who want to speak, and if the demand for the previous question is sustained, I will divide my hour among these gentlemen if they desire that amount of time.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SMART. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PARKER.]

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I desire to occupy only a moment in regard to this matter. It seems to me as though this proposition is a very simple one. The chairman of the committee has very truly stated what the action of the Committee on Patents has been. I do not think this House need apprehend that there will be any particular difficulty in regard to the arbitrary extension of patents on the recommendation of this committee. We have very fully considered that matter; and though it is not proper for me to state in this House the action of the committee, still I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that there will not be any extension of patents granted on the recommendation of the present committee, unless there ought to be. I think if ever there has been a conservative Committee on Patents, the present committee is.

Now, what is this case? I desire to have the House understand it. Under the law this patentee received his original patent for the term of fourteen years. Of course, under the old law he was privileged to go before the Commissioner of Patents for an extension for seven years. He availed himself of that privilege under that law as it then existed. Everybody was notified, and had a right to appear, under the notice, before the Commissioner and oppose the extension of the patent. The law was complied with. The gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] and every other gentleman, had a right to appear before the Commissioner and oppose that extension. I do not know but he did appear. I do not know what parties were heard; but everybody had a right to appear before the Commissioner and oppose the extension. It was a full hearing before the Commissioner. The law was complied with in all respects. And after there had been a full hearing, the matter was adjudicated, and the extension was granted.

Now, this is the naked question: Under the old law, as I have before stated, the original term of the patent was fourteen years. And the simple question is, whether or not the original patent expired on the 27th or the 28th day of June; whether or not the extension should date the 27th or 28th? The Commissioner of Patents held that it should date from the 28th day of June, and accordingly the extension was so dated.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Was there anything to prevent this inventor applying one week, or two weeks, or a month, before he did apply?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. He was only required, under the law, to apply ninety days before the expiration of the original patent, and he did apply six months before that. He applied, submitted all his evidence, put in his whole case, and the thing was fully adjudicated.

Mr. CONGER. And paid his fees.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Yes, sir; and paid his fees. There was a full hearing. But the absence of the Commissioner of Patents prevented a decision. The Commissioner of Patents was absent from his office until the very day of the expiration of the original patent. When he returned the applicant got his patent, as he now believes, and as he did then believe, on the 28th day of June, which was sufficient to make the extension valid.

But some lawyers have raised the question as to the validity of this extension. Sufficient objections have been brought against the validity of this extension to prevent the patentee from realizing under the extension, and we simply come in here and ask the House to legalize the act of the Commissioner, so that the original patentee shall not be deprived of the rights which were granted to him, which the Commissioner of Patents found were due to him under his patent. That is all. It is simply to legalize the act of the Commissioner.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to ask the gentleman if this is not, in other words, to compel McCormick to pay this patentee?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I do not think that is the object of this legislation; that may be the result of it, or it may not. It simply is proposed to legalize the act of the Commissioner; that is all. The whole thing was fairly heard before the Commissioner; everybody had a right to go before him; and if they were not heard it was their own fault. But it seems a little singular to me that gentlemen should get up here now and endeavor to invalidate the act of the Commissioner. It seems to me as if the proposition was as clear as the noon-day sun.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I, myself, am unable to make a distinction between this and an ordinary case of extending a patent. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] utterly failed to meet the case the House is called upon to consider, as also has the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PARKER.] He says it is simply a matter of validating the act of the Commissioner, and he tells us that our action here, if adverse to this application, will invalidate that action of the Commissioner.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Not necessarily so.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is what the gentleman said to us. If the action of the Commissioner is valid, certainly there is no need of any action in this case. If his action is invalid, if he has endeavored to continue this patent without authority of law, then we come back to the precise question presented in all cases for extension, to wit, whether the patent should be extended. As for myself, it seems to me that seventeen years is a sufficient time for the existence of a monopoly. If the invention is a good one, it ought to realize to the patentee a sufficient reward in seventeen years; if it is a bad one and never will realize anything, then there is no reason why the public should not have the benefit of it and improve upon it if they can.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. It is not as the gentleman states; it is not simply a question of extending a patent. The question is simply to give to this patentee the rights which he has acquired under the law. The gentleman says that if this extension is valid, then we need take no action here at all, for the courts will so decide. Now, if it is not valid, that is not the fault of the patentee, but purely the fault of the Commissioner of Patents. And I ask the gentleman in all candor and justice if the patentee ought to suffer through a mistake of the Commissioner of Patents? That is the question.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to ask the gentleman one question in the line of his argument.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Very well.

Mr. SPEER. If the Commissioner of Patents fails to do his duty, is there any remedy under the law on the part of the patentee against him?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Not at all, as I understand it. His only remedy is to come here to Congress.

Mr. SPEER. Precisely so.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. And he has come here.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Has the inventor in this case any rights before the courts to decide the validity of the act of the Commissioner?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I suppose he has; I suppose he can go before the courts. But the question is one of equity. Ought this House to compel this man, when he has done everything the law required him to do, when he has done everything he ought to do, when he has laid his case completely and clearly before the Commissioner—ought we to compel him to go into the courts, and thereby suffer great expense?

Mr. SMART. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SAYLER] for ten minutes.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. The object of this bill has been very clearly and forcibly stated by gentlemen who have preceded me. As I understand it, the question is one entirely and solely curative of a possible defect. Congress has time and again proclaimed by enactment its policy upon the subject of patents. And however conservative I may be, however opposed I may be to the great monopolies that grow out of the manufacture of patented articles, I still recognize the validity of a policy that has been carried down through all the history of this country in relation to patents.

In this case the patentee, pursuing his rights under the statutes, made his showing to the Commissioner of Patents, and he had the adjudication of the Patent Office upon that showing. Wholly and solely by a mistake on the part of an officer of the Government, a question has arisen as to the validity of this extension; and now this patentee comes here, with an interest amounting to $5,000, asking that that question may be quieted in his interest; and under the policy that has been pursued there are in this case all the elements that entitle it to a fair and candid hearing on the part of the House, and relief should be granted.

It is not so much a question where the ultimate benefit of this patent is to go, as it is whether we shall provide here the relief which appeals to every man's broad conscience, and to the full and unquestioned power of Congress. If this extension is invalid at all, it is invalid solely by the mistake in the date, and that mistake was made by the Commissioner of Patents. If it is valid, then legislation will hurt no one. The proposed legislation is not upon its face in the nature of an extension, although in effect it may possibly be in the nature of an extension.

On its face it is in the nature of an act quieting title. There are, in this case, all the elements that would entitle any party in a court of equity or a court of law to a new trial. It is upon that principle that we are acting.

Now, sir, had there been in this case any neglect or want of care on the part of the inventor, it might be proper to visit upon him the consequences of his own want of diligence. But he has shown himself to have been diligent in every possible particular. He was in the Patent Office on the 27th of June, asking the acting Commissioner of Patents to sign the extension of the patent which had already been decreed to him. But the acting Commissioner stated that he preferred the Commissioner should sign the paper; that he would be here the next day, and that that would be in sufficient time. This poor inventor, (belonging to a class of whom we have heard so much,) thus coming here with his hands clean, having exercised all possible diligence, having applied when it was clearly in time for an extension of his patent, and that extension having been decreed to him, comes here now and asks that he may be enabled to receive the only substantial reward he has ever received from his patent. However much opposed I may be to these monopolies, however indignant I may grow over a contemplation of the oppressive power which they in many cases exercise over the people, I recognize the merits of the poor man who in his garret or by his rush-light develops a useful invention, and such a man I feel like recognizing in a substantial manner.

This man comes in here and states frankly that he has conditionally sold his extended patent for $5,000. As an honest man he comes here and proclaims the facts. There is no "cat in the meal-sack" about this matter. Stating the facts fully, he asks that he may have the benefit of his invention to the extent of $5,000. If we refuse this application, let it be proclaimed that all rights, of whatever character, are to be disregarded here; that all applicants for pensions, or anything else, are to be sent to the courts or the Departments; and if they fail there, they must suffer without pity from Congress.

Mr. SMART. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to detain the House but a few minutes with any remarks on this subject. I simply desire to say that upon general principles I would be opposed to extending any patent that had expired by limitation of law. But this case appears upon its face to be meritorious. We are asked simply to correct an error of the Commissioner of Patents. Under the law, as it existed prior to 1872, it was the duty of the Commissioner to examine these applications for extension, and if he believed the application to be meritorious, to extend the patent for a term of seven years. Evidently the Commissioner regarded this as a meritorious case upon the showing made, and decided to extend the patent for seven years.

Now, I do not believe the agriculturists of the country, who have been spoken of by gentlemen here who oppose this measure, demand that any act of injustice shall be done to any individual in this land. If this young man has, by his inventive genius, made a valuable improvement, and obtained a patent-right thereto, which is beneficial to the whole country; and if, after due examination, it has appeared that justice demands an extension of the patent for seven years, I do not believe that the mistake of a single day should force this patentee into the courts of the country to obtain his rights.

Besides, sir, the favorable action of Congress upon this bill will perhaps save to the agricultural interests of the country hundreds of thousand of dollars, for this reason: it may be a mooted question, and probably is, whether this patent has been extended or not. Unless Congress acts in this matter, the parties will be compelled to go into the courts. Persons may use this improvement, believing that the extension has not been legally made; thus a question will arise which will drive parties into the courts. This litigation will make the agricultural implement in question more expensive to the farming community than it would be if the question were now promptly settled by Congress. While I represent an agricultural community, I do not represent a constituency that demands of me to do an act of injustice to any human being in the land. I respect the inventive genius of New England as I respect the rights of the farming community of the great West; and I am ready at all times to vote in favor of according equal and exact justice to all.

Mr. SMART. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of this debate I endeavored, through a series of questions, which were put as quietly as I could put them, and with as good grace as I could deliver them, to ascertain from the gentleman who had charge of this bill the nature of this invention or machine, and all about it. I was not successful in my inquiries; but I have learned during the progress of the debate that the patent in question is for some appliance connected with the McCormick machine. Now, every western man knows that every patent on that machine has been most amply paid for. But it seems we cannot be permitted to push inquiries to such an extent as to get the information we desire without having eastern members of this House read us long lectures on different subjects relative to emigration, political economy, &c. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PARKER] put it almost clearly before the House. He says this gentleman, after having had fourteen years' use of this invention, asked for its extension. He said there was a judicial hearing, and everybody might have gone there. I think that was the spirit of his remarks. Mr. Speaker, you know very well only one side goes there to be heard in that case. What I wish to learn is this: whether that judicial act which was had at that time to extend this patent was on some part of the McCormick machine which the judgment of every western man would not extend? If I can ascertain that to be the fact, then, sir, I think this House should not lend its aid to make that judicial act binding.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. You say this was an ex parte hearing. Do you not know under the law everybody is notified?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I know that.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. And all parties are heard there?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly I know they are all heard. On the one side is the man who asks for an extension of the McCormick machine——

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Do you not know you had the right to appear to be heard?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I know on one side is this man asking for an extension of the McCormick machine, and on the other side are all the farmers of the West who use that machine.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Why did you not appear?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly, why did I not? This one thing I wish to learn, and this is all. If this extension was given on some part of the McCormick machine which should not have been given, then I do not want to give my vote to add to that blunder and to extend for seven years further that nuisance.

Mr. SMART. I will now yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McDILL.]

Mr. McDILL, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, as I come from a section of the country where the public mind is much excited on the question of patent rights, I wish to explain my vote on this bill. I shall vote for the bill as reported from the Committee on Patents. It is simply a proposition to do justice. A duly authorized agent of the Government, the Commissioner of Patents, was called upon to act under the law, and did act under the law, granting an extension of the patent; but by mistake—if it be a mistake, and that is not certain—by mistake of only one day there is danger that the person to whom he awarded the extension will lose his rights. All this bill proposes to do is to make certain the rights guaranteed to this man by the proper officer. This question of extension was determined judicially by the officer to whom the power was given to determine it. All, it seems to me, there is in the case is whether we shall do simple justice to this man. If our agent has made a mistake, shall we deny this right to this inventor, even though that mistake was made?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill into the House, and it is now before the Committee on the Public Lands, in which I ask the American Congress to do what is right in reference to certain homesteaders. I place my claim upon this ground, that it was the action of the officers of the Government which induced these homesteaders to make the mistake they did in settling upon the public lands. But how can I come here and ask the American Congress to rectify that mistake, made because of the action of the Government's agents, if I shall deny justice to this man when he asks we shall correct the mistake of the agent of the Government, the Commissioner of Patents? I do not understand western people are opposed to granting patent rights. I understand they are indignant at the exaction and grinding of certain monopolists who have acquired patent rights from inventors, and from whom they have suffered. They wish Congress, when the question comes before it, to see to it that no patent shall be improperly extended. I apprehend no people who understand right and justice will ask us to interfere with that with which we have nothing to do, and that is to interfere with the judicial determination of this case by the Commissioner of Patents. It has been decided this patent shall be extended, and we cannot go behind that question; and the simple question remaining is whether we shall correct a mistake of one day in order that this man may not be involved in endless lawsuits. Nor is the McCormick reaper before us, but only some poor inventor, who has invented some improvement in harvesters and sold his invention to McCormick, but who will not be able, except at the end of a long lawsuit, to recover the money for which he sold his invention unless we pass this bill as an act of simple justice.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this bill; and I hope I will be found, when the question comes up as to the extension of a patent by the American Congress, true to this principle, that I will never vote for an extension unless I feel it is just and right and proper the inventor should have such extension.

Mr. SMART. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

Mr. LOWE. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has called the previous question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the following questions: This inventor, or his assignee, having had a property in fourteen years' exclusive use of his invention under the law, it is now stated by the committee that it is doubtful whether he has a property in seven years' additional exclusive use of his invention. If he has such property, then he is protected under the law, and if his rights are violated the courts are open for redress, as in any other case of the violation of the rights of property. If he has not such property, is it in the power of Congress, by legislation, to confer a property when none exists, as against others? And if Congress has such power, is it equitable or proper that the same should be exercised? This is not a mere matter of the correction of a mistake between the Government on the one hand and an individual on the other; there, so far as the Government is concerned, the power of Congress is unquestioned; but, if the legislation is worth anything, it is for the purpose of giving a property to this inventor that he now does not have, as against all other individuals; and the power to so legislate, in a case of this kind, I question; and if such power does exist, against its exercise I protest.

Mr. SMART. I will state to the gentleman that Congress can legalize the extension, as nobody has acquired the right to use this property.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill; and being taken there were—ayes 87, noes not counted.

Mr. DUNNELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 17; not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were refused, and the bill was passed.

Mr. SMART moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF ADMIRAL FARRAGUT.

Mr. SESSIONS. I ask unanimous consent to report back, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, for present consideration, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 59) amending joint resolution of April 16, 1872, relating to a statue of the late Admiral Farragut.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I ask that, instead of agreeing to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, the House shall now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for general debate. There are a number of gentlemen here who desire to speak, and the House is getting thin for business.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I object to the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I make the motion which I have indicated. I move that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take into consideration the President's message.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before either of those propositions is submitted to the House, it appears to me that it may be possible to adopt another mode of proceeding which may be acceptable to the friends of both the propositions. I suggest that the House should agree, at a certain hour to-day—say at half-past four o'clock—to take a recess until half-past seven, and then meet for debate on the President's message, having devoted the afternoon to the Private Calendar. I understand that some gentlemen who desire to speak will be satisfied with that disposition of the time.

Mr. BURCHARD. I suggest that the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] might be adopted by unanimous consent.

Objection was made by several members.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I demand the regular order.

Mr. McCRARY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it now in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the President's message?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] takes precedence.

Mr. McCRARY. If that should not carry, would not the only question then in order be to proceed with the consideration of the special order, being the bill reported from the Committee on Railways and Canals?

The SPEAKER. That also would take precedence; and if neither motion should be adopted, then the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] would be in order. It is at any time competent for the House, by a majority vote, to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order, or to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message. The rules merely prescribe the precedence of the respective motions; and the first in order is that of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. BECK. I wish to say a word to the gentleman from Illinois. There are several gentlemen on this side, and, I believe, on the other side of the House, who desire to make speeches. They have never spoken. They have never interrupted business. They have never interposed objections. And I think some respect should be paid to their wishes. And there are special reasons in the case of some of them. One of my colleagues, who has sickness in his family, may not have an opportunity to speak for some time if he does not have that opportunity to-day. I do not want to be heard myself. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will allow a general debate to ensue now. If he is a little accommodating to those gentlemen it will certainly aid him in the progress of the business he has in charge to a much greater extent than if he should insist on proceeding with business to-day.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Yesterday I withdrew the objection I had made to having the day set apart for general debate. Great pressure was brought to bear upon me, and I yielded. But when I withdrew the objection it was renewed by others. And as there are a great many gentlemen who are anxious that the House should go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calender, any consent of mine to meet the wishes of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] would have no effect.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will not believe that any gentleman in this House refuses to allow the House to go into Committee of the Whole to prevent his speaking to us.

Mr. BECK. Of course not.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I heard yesterday the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] intimate to the gentleman from Kentucky that the reason the proposition for a session to-day for debate only was not agreed to was, that gentlemen were afraid that the gentleman from Kentucky was to make a speech to be sent to New England. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I merely repeated to the gentleman from Kentucky what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] had stated to me; but for myself I have no objection to hearing a speech from the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I make myself so extremely agreeable that, if I want to make a speech, I have no doubt there would be unanimous consent. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. For myself, so far as regards political or any other considerations, I would be delighted to hear the gentleman speak.

Mr. BECK. I have no doubt of that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY,] that the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MAYNARD. If that proposition should prevail, I hope there will be an opportunity to test the other question I have suggested, whether we shall have an evening session for debate.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 70, noes 53.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. RANDALL said: On that question I call for the yeas and nays. We will waste the day anyhow.

Mr. MAYNARD. Let us submit the other proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I raise the point of order. Is it in order for a gentleman to state to this House that "we will waste the day anyhow?"

Mr. RANDALL. I am responsible for that, and nobody else.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] when the House was about to vote whether it would go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, said "We will waste the day anyhow." I submit that such a threat as that is out of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the gentleman himself is wasting time by such technicalities.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to say that the language used by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was in private conversation, directed to me alone.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I repeat it to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not rule that the words were out of order; he will say they may be considered as impolite, though not unparliamentary. [Laughter.]

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 29, noes 86.

So (one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not think we will be able to do much to-day; it is Saturday in the afternoon, and some of us have religious scruples about working late on Saturday. I therefore move that the House do adjourn.

The SPEAKER. It is not parliamentary for gentlemen to give reasons for adjournment.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered, one-fifth voting in the affirmative upon a division—ayes 27, noes 68.

Mr. KELLOGG. I suggest that, with two calls of the yeas and nays ordered, we may as well yield the point and allow the rest of the afternoon for debate.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, one-fifth voting in the affimative, there being on a division—ayes 24, noes 72.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn until Tuesday next, and there were—yeas 5, nays 195, not voting 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arthur, Eldredge, O'Brien, Sawyer, and Sloss—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Cotton, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Curtis, John J. Williams, Willie, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, James Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodford, Woodworth, and John D. Young—195.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albert, Archer, Barnum, Barry, Bass, Begole, Berry, Biery, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Alexander M. Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Dobbins, Eden, Elliott, Freeman, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, William A. Smith, Standeford, Stephens, St. John, Storm, Swann, Sypher, Thomas, Thornburgh, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wilber, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Pierce M. B. Young—90.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the remainder of this session may be devoted to debate only.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I made the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, stating at the same time that on yestesday I withdrew my objection to devote to-day for debate, and that I did not object to that to-day. I supposed at the time it was understood that I made no objection. I make none now. From the vote upon my proposition it appeared that a majority were in favor of going into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. It is quite as manifest now that a large majority of the House are determined that no further business shall be transacted to-day. I do not think it necessary to keep members here who may wish to go away, when no business can be done.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the suggestion to save time.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a personal question. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] made a point of order upon some language which I used, and which I think was in order. The Speaker ruled, and I think properly, that my language was not out of order; but he subsequently stated that, while not out of order, it was impolite. Now, I do not wish to stand before the House and the country in the attitude of having been guilty of impoliteness; and I hope the Speaker will state upon what ground he held that I have been impolite.

The SPEAKER. The Chair made the remark in a merely jocular manner; he did not intend to arraign the gentleman upon any charge of impoliteness. The Chair the more gladly relieves the gentleman from any imputation of that kind, because he does not know that a ruling upon a question of impoliteness would be open to appeal, and he will not assume an absolute authority.

Mr. RANDALL. It is all right; I only wanted to have the matter properly understood.

Mr. HUBBELL. I suppose the remark was to be taken "in a Pickwickian sense."

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I desire to state that on the question of adjourning over I was paired with the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. SENER. If here, he would have voted "no," while I should have voted "ay."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] states that he desires to withdraw the motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] withdraws the motion that the House adjourn. The only pending motion is that of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS,] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the consideration of the President's message. Before putting that motion, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING.]

RELEASE OF EDWIN O'MEAGHER CONDON.

Mr. BANNING. I desire to present the petition of J. B. Purcell, archbishop of Cincinnati; Edward F. Noyes, late governor of Ohio; and 100 other leading citizens of Ohio, for the release of Edwin O'Meagher Condon, an American citizen, now imprisoned in England. I ask that a statement of his case may be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The case of Edward O'Meagher Condon, now confined in Portland convict prison, England, convicted for complicity in the killing of a policeman in Manchester.

Edward O'Meagher Condon, a citizen of the United States, late a resident of Cincinnati, Ohio, was sent over to Ireland from Cincinnati, in the spring of 1867, to attend to some property left to his father by an uncle. He was instructed to call at Manchester on his return, to see two relatives residing there. While in Manchester he was arrested for complicity in the killing of the aforesaid policeman, under the following circumstances:

Two suspected Fenians, named Kelley and Deacy, were being sent to jail in a prison van, with other prisoners. The van was stopped about half-way between the court-house and jail by a party of forty men, who demanded the release of the two suspected Fenians. They ordered the policeman inside the van to open the doors. He had the keys, but refused to comply. The party then proceeded to break open the van with stones, &c., but failing, one of them fired a pistol into the key-hole to burst the lock. The bullet accomplished the object, and shot the policeman inside. There was no intention to injure the man. It might as well be one of the prisoners who would get hurt; but he was in the course of the bullet and got killed.

Condon was arrested the same evening three miles away from the place of the accident. The affair created the wildest excitement and great alarm throughout England, particularly in Manchester; and in the midst of this popular panic a special commission was appointed to convict the prisoners. They were tried in batches of fives, and Condon, an American, was included in the first batch. They were all convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to be hanged. Twenty-five witnesses swore against one man, fifteen against two more, ten against the fourth, and five against Condon. The person who had ten witnesses against him was liberated on the application of the reporters, who declared that he did not have a fair trial.

Mr. BANNING. I have also a letter from Hon. Samuel F. Cary, formerly a member of this House, who, while in England, visited Mr. Condon in prison and thinks he is improperly confined. I have also a letter of Hon. J. D. Fitzgerald, one of the judges of England. I ask that the petition, together with these letters, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

The petition and letters are as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Your petitioners, residents of the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, respectfully but earnestly ask that you will by proper resolution or otherwise interpose in behalf of Edward O'M. Condon, a citizen of this State and city, now in confinement in the Portland convict establishment, in England, for the alleged murder of a policeman in Manchester.

Your petitioners state that young Condon was, in 1867, a resident of this city, and was a good, industrious, and honest young man, respected by all who knew him; that in that year he was sent over to Ireland from Cincinnati to attend to some property left his father, Thomas Condon, of this city, and was also instructed on his return to call on two relatives living in Manchester, England; that while near said Manchester he was arrested for alleged complicity in the murder of a policeman of Manchester; that he was hurriedly tried, and, as we fully believe, by false testimony of perjured witnesses, condemned to death; that thereafter, upon representations made by Mr. Adams, the American minister, to the British government, his sentence was commuted or a reprieve granted; that he has since then, now more than five years, been imprisoned in England, and still lies there in jail; and we state that he had ever been while in the United States a young man of exemplary character; that his long confinement has worn upon his health, and must ultimately, added to the keen sense of the injustice of his condemnation, kill him, unless he is released; that he was the main hope and stay of his parents, Thomas Condon and wife, who are old, and that his sad condition has brought untold sorrow and distress upon his family; that his release is demanded by justice and mercy both; that his trial was hasty and imperfect, and he was made a victim to falsehood and excitement; that we have no doubt, if the British government would authorize a new trial in his case, it would be clearly shown that he is innocent of the great crime imputed to him. And we, his parents, neighbors, and friends, earnestly ask your honorable bodies to take such action as will be consistent with your honor, and that of our country, and also, as will afford the English government the opportunity to show to American citizens that justice which no government is more constant and energetic in demanding for her own subjects than she is.

THOMAS CONDON, his father.
ELLEN CONDON, his mother.

I recommend and request that a new trial be granted if possible.

EDWARD F. NOYES,
Governor of Ohio.
J. B. PURCELL,
Archbishop Cincinnati.
M. H. TILDEN,
Judge Superior Court.
W. S. GROESBECK.
ALFRED YAPLE,
Judge of Superior Court of Cincinnati, State of Ohio.

I cheerfully concur in the request of Governor E. F. Noyes.

S. S. DAVIS,
Mayor of Cincinnati.

We are not acquainted with the facts of the case or the laws under which Condon was tried, but Mr. and Mrs. Condon are worthy people, their son is their stay, and his release would be a mercy and a blessing to them.

7 MERRION SQUARE, EAST DUBLIN,
February 14, 1873.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 22d, and in reply take leave to assure you that I did not write to Mr. Secretary Bruce. I did not receive from him the reply which you describe. My position as a judge prohibits me from interfering in any case not tried before me, and even then only when called on by government for a report. Mr. Kenelm Digby, member of Parliament for the Queen's County, is a connection of mine, and a valued friend, whose opinion I very much respect. He was deeply interested in your son's case, and he has frequently conversed with me about him and his trial. I learned from Mr. Digby that he has studied the case carefully and had come to the conclusion that your son, Edward O'Meagher Condon, or Shore, had taken no part in the homicide of the constable of Manchester, and was implicated by taking part in the riot, and by stone-throwing only; that he was unarmed, and that there was no proof against him of any previous design. I had no knowledge whatever of the case myself. Mr. Digby felt very much for one so young and prepossessing as your son, but felt more for you and the family. I am aware of the great exertion he has made to procure your son's release, and I would have aided him if I had the power to do so.

I have no doubt that Mr. Digby will not be deterred by previous failures from continuing his efforts, and I most sincerely hope that zeal and efforts may soon prove successful.

I can only express my feelings for you and your afflictions, and remain your faithful,

J. D. FITZGERALD.

Mr. THOMAS CONDON.

CINCINNATI, January 28, 1874.

SIR: When in England, I took special pains to get the facts in relation to the case of Condon, alias Shore, convicted of murder in Manchester, with three others. The others were executed. On account of well-grounded doubts of the participation of Shore in the murder his sentence was commuted. Mr. Moran, our secretary of legation at the Court of Saint James, was very much interested in the case, and after a thorough investigation came to the conclusion that Shore, alias Condon, was entirely innocent. I conversed with Jacob Bright, M. P., Mr. Potter, Sir Wilfred Lawson, and other members of Parliament, who expressed much interest in behalf of the accused. Young Condon is a worthy son of most worthy parents in your district, and every effort possible should be made to secure his liberty from confinement and his return to his family.

Mr. Moran can furnish all the facts in the case if written to.

I send you copy of petition, &c., and a letter from one of the most eminent judges of Ireland, to the father. The latter you will please preserve.

Yours, &c.,

S. F. CARY.

Hon. H. B. BANNING, M. C.

EXPLORATION OF PALESTINE, EAST SIDE OF THE JORDAN.

Mr. GUNCKEL, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of citizens of New York and New Haven, in favor of the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 63) to authorize the Secretary of War to detail an Army officer to continue the survey and exploration of Palestine, on the east side of the Jordan; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF ONTONAGON HARBOR.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to an appropriation to repair the existing pile-work on the west side of Ontonagon Harbor, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 253) for the relief of Thomas Hillhouse, assistant treasurer of the United States in New York City;

An act (H. R. No. 447) extending the time for the completion of the Green Bay, Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal, in the State of Wisconsin;

An act (H. R. No. 1225) granting a pension to William E. Prince, of Iowa;

An act (H. R. No. 1284) authorizing the chief clerk of the War Department to sign requisitions on the Treasury during the temporary absence of the Secretary of War; and

An act (H. R. No. 2201) to render available a certain unexpended balance of appropriation.

SECESSION, NATURALIZATION, ETC.

Mr. CLAYTON, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of citizens of California, asking an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the withdrawing of any State from the Union, also showing the relations of civil and ecclesiastical authority, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, your memorialists, citizens of the United States, respectfully represent that—

Whereas a portion of our fellow-citizens believe that allegiance to their respective States is paramount, and, in vindication of that opinion, appealed to the sword, the highest arbiter of nations; and, notwithstanding the decision of the battle-field was against them, and that the people have, in four consecutive presidential elections, decided in favor of national sovereignty, many of our people still believe their highest allegiance is due to the State, your memorialists believe the time has fully come when this controversy should be terminated by an amendment to the Constitution, so explicit as to remove all doubt on the subject; and whereas our theory of government wisely separates Church and State, leaving each independent within its own sphere, and guaranteeing to the citizen the free exercise of his religion, yet our Constitution nowhere discriminates between the secular and the spiritual, the civil and the ecclesiastical, nor clearly affirms the supremacy of either in secular affairs; and as many foreigners who reach our shores hold to the supremacy of the ecclesiastical authority in all things, spiritual and temporal, these are liable to misunderstand our theory of government; it seems therefore to your memorialists that justice to the foreigner, as well as the safety of our institutions, requires an amendment to our Constitution on this subject, and a corresponding amendment to our naturalization laws. These measures may preserve for a time our admirable system of government; but the only safeguard against the dangerous theories mentioned—the only guarantee of its perpetuity—is in the education of the people in its fundamental principles. For the foregoing reasons your memorialists respectfully pray your honorable bodies—

First. To submit to the people an amendment to our Federal Constitution, declaring that the people of the United States constitute one nation, and that no State, nor any number of States, can withdraw therefrom.

Secondly. An amendment to the Constitution, showing the relations of civil and ecclesiastical authority—asserting the supremacy of the former in secular matters.

Thirdly. To amend our naturalization laws, so as to require all applicants for citizenship, besides the renunciation of allegiance to civil powers now required, to renounce civil and political allegiance to all hierarchical authorities whatever.

Fourthly. To provide a national text-book, containing a brief exposition of the principles of civil government, the Constitution of the United States, a commentary thereon explaining the relations of the Federal and State governments; also, the relations of the civil and ecclesiastical authorities, with such other instruction as may be necessary to enable the citizen to perform, in an intelligent manner, the responsible duties pertaining to the high prerogative of American citizenship.

Fifthly. To enact a law requiring said text-book to be used in all our schools and institutions of learning, both public and private; and to make education compulsory.

All which is respectfully submitted, and for which your memorialists will ever pray.

OPERATORS OF DEPARTMENTAL TELEGRAPH.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce, and have passed, a bill to appropriate $1,400 to pay the operators in the departmental telegraph connected with the two Houses of Congress. No appropriation has been made for this purpose, although the operators have been employed in pursuance of law. It is now the end of the month; and as we do not know how many months these men will be employed (they are employed according to law during the session only, at $100 a month) I have prepared a bill which I send to the desk to be read, and which I hope will be passed at once.

The bill was read. It appropriates $1,400, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the two Houses of Congress to pay the telegraph operators employed under the provisions of an act in relation to the lines of telegraph connecting the Capitol with the various Departments of the Government; and the sum of $700 is added to the contingent fund of each House, to enable the clerks thereof to make payments in accordance with this act.

There being no objection the bill (H. R. No. 2224) was introduced, read three times, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FUR-BEARING ANIMALS IN ALASKA.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] asks unanimous consent to introduce a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska." If there be no objection the bill (H. R. No. 225) will be read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for debate on the President's message.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to know whether the gentleman who made that motion did it with the understanding on the part of the House that no further business should be done to-day. I think that ought to be understood now, before going into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the understanding that when the Committee of the Whole shall rise, no motion shall be in order except to adjourn?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. If that is not embraced in the motion, I desire so to amend it.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I will accept that as an amendment in modification of my motion.

The SPEAKER. That arrangement requires unanimous consent. No objection being made, it will be so ordered.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. E. H. ROBERTS to go into Committee of the Whole, the Speaker declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. BRADLEY. I desire to introduce a bill, to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Would it be in order to move that the House adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The House has just decided to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, and Mr. RUSK. We voted that motion down.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, on putting the question, declared that the ayes appeared to prevail; but of course, if gentlemen desire a division, they are entitled to it.

FUR-BEARING ANIMALS IN ALASKA.

Mr. CONGER. The bill of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] in regard to fur-bearing animals in Alaska, was referred, as I understand, to the Committee on Ways and Means. It should go to the Committee on Commerce. I object to any other reference.

The SPEAKER. This difficulty shows the evil of departing from the rule which the Chair so constantly tries to enforce, which forbids the introduction of bills on any other day than Monday.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the introduction of the bill unless for reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will consider the objection as being in time. Bills ought to be presented for reference on Monday.

Mr. KASSON. Is objection made?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan states that the subject belongs to his committee, the Committee on Commerce, and ought not to go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. KASSON. I was not aware the Committee on Commerce ever had jurisdiction of the subject; and inasmuch as the Government derives revenue from this business, I presumed, of course, it belonged to the Committee on Ways and Means. It was in pursuance of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury that this was done.

Mr. CONGER. The whole subject in reference to these fur-seal islands has been placed in charge of the Committee on Commerce by order of the House.

Mr. KASSON. If that be so, then I have been laboring under a mistake. I have had no desire to antagonize the Committee on Commerce with the Committee on Ways and Means. My impression was that the subject properly belonged to the Committee on Ways and Means, and so suggested its reference to that committee.

The SPEAKER. On Monday morning the attention of the whole House is brought directly to the reference of bills. Then they are legitimately in order, while at any other time they are not.

Mr. KASSON. Let it go to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. There being no further objection, it will be so referred.

Mr. KELLEY. I move the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The House is dividing to make certain whether or not it will go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to discuss the President's message.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 54.

Mr. LYNCH. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The question is whether the House will go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to discuss the President's message, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does not such a limitation of business require unanimous consent? The Chair propounds the question upon going into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, no business whatever to be done. Does not that require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It has been the habit of the House to entertain such motions, and to allow the majority of the House to decide whether or not they will go into Committee of the Whole under such limitation. Unanimous consent has been already given that when the committee rises, if the House shall go into committee, there shall be entertained only a motion to adjourn.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The point on which I desire the ruling of the Chair is this: whether limitation of business in committee does not require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Strictly speaking it does.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then I object.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to ask a question. Suppose on the call of the yeas and nays the motion to adjourn over to Tuesday next was defeated, then the next motion in order, upon which the yeas and nays had also been ordered, was the motion to adjourn. I understood, however, that motion was withdrawn by unanimous consent; otherwise it could not have been withdrawn, the yeas and nays having been ordered. Unanimous consent was given at the same time by the other side of the House that the motion the House should resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up and discussing the President's message should prevail. There was, as I understand, unanimous consent to that proposition, objection having been withdrawn by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] as well as by some other gentlemen.

Now, if that unanimous consent does not operate so as to put the House into the Committee of the Whole, I ask whether or not the original motion, the withdrawal of which was predicated upon the granting of this unanimous consent—whether the motion to adjourn is not now in order, and whether, the yeas and nays having been ordered upon it, the regular order of business is not to proceed with the call of the yeas and nays on that motion to adjourn?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If that be so, and what the gentleman from Maryland states actually happened, then, although that unanimous consent did not cover this particular matter, in reference to which I have interposed objection, I now persist in my objection.

Mr. O'BRIEN. In my judgment, the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts comes too late.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. But the Speaker has already ruled that my objection is in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let me make a single suggestion. I made a motion to adjourn, and when the Speaker gave notice that it was withdrawn I supposed it was with the understanding, on the part of the House, that it would resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up and discussing the President's annual message.

Mr. O'BRIEN. That was the understanding.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I assented to the withdrawal of my motion to adjourn for that reason, and for none other. I understand that to have been agreed to by the House. It is true that I do not know exactly that it was. The Speaker stated the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin would be withdrawn and the motion made to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which I supposed was a harmonious arrangement of a difficulty which seemed to exist. It was upon that ground alone I consented the Speaker should withdraw my motion.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I made the objection, and I wish the Chair would allow me to state, if any unanimous consent was made—I was not present myself at the time—by which these gentlemen withdrew certain motions, and the expectation was the House would go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, then I would not consider it proper to interpose objection to carrying out that arrangement, and certainly now withdraw the objection I have already made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I for one think good faith requires we should allow the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in order to give gentlemen an opportunity to speak; for, according to my understanding, that was the agreement.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not know that unanimous consent was given, but I supposed it was given, because the Speaker stated that my motion was withdrawn, and that the question would be put on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message, no business to be transacted.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the Speaker be kind enough to state what is his recollection?

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY,] the chairman of the Committee on Claims, withdrew his motion to go into Committee of the Whole, stating his reasons therefor, that the motion might be adopted, that the remainder of the day be devoted to debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message, the Chair had the impression that a general assent was given to that; and he accordingly nodded to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] receiving from him an assenting nod, and thereupon the gentleman withdrew his motion to adjourn, in order to clear the way for the proposition to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which was pending on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS.] The Chair thought that that was the general understanding, and proceeded to clear off some details of business preparatory to that. Then the further proposition was made by the gentleman frem Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] that when the committee rose no business should be in order except to adjourn; and the Chair put the motion.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Did not the Chair understand that unanimous consent was given that nothing but debate should be in order?

The SPEAKER. That was the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Was not unanimous consent then given that the House should go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on that understanding?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not insist further on my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remark that the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] was good. Under the rules the House may go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or it may go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. But it has been customary, also, although more in previous years than latterly, for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for discussion of the President's message, that is, for debate only, nothing else being in order. The Chair understood that unanimous consent was given for the House resolving itself into Committee of the Whole on the President's message.

Mr. RUSK. I only gave consent that we should take a vote whether we should go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. That is the understanding I had.

The SPEAKER. Then, if the majority vote is that the House shall go into Committee of the Whole, the House will go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of general debate.

The question being put, shall the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the President's message, there were—ayes 96, noes 51.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 32.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is somewhat embarrassed by that motion. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. RUSK] explained that when unanimous consent was asked to going into Committee of the Whole on the President's message, he understood the unanimous consent to be that the motion should be submitted.

Mr. RUSK. That was my understanding.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair has so interpreted the unanimous consent as being unanimous consent that the motion should be submitted.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to ask the Chair whether, when the gentleman from Wisconsin withdrew his motion to adjourn, it is out of order for anybody else to make that motion?

The SPEAKER. It would not be, unless the House should unanimously agree otherwise.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I did not agree.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not object.

Mr. KELLOGG. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. I submit to the Chair and to the House whether it is parliamentary for our side of the House to engage in filibustering at this time of the afternoon by motions to adjourn and calling the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 59, noes 79.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 49, nays 142, not voting 99; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Begole, Burleigh, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Corwin, Crooke, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Frye, Gooch, Harrison, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hoskins, Houghton, Hyde, Kasson, Lynch, Maynard, Orr, Orth, Packard, Isaac C. Parker, Thomas C. Platt, Pratt, Ray, Richmond, Rusk, Henry B. Sayler, Sessions, Smart, H. Smith, Standeford, Stephens, St. John, Storm, Strait, Swann, Sypher, Thomas, Waddell, Wallace, Wells, Whitehouse, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Wood, and Woodford—99.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to make a brief statement, and give my reasons for making the motion to adjourn, as I do not propose to submit any other motion at this time. When the House got through with the morning hour to-day, the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Claims, [Mr. HAWLEY,] submitted a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, which motion was in order to-day. The gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] proposed to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of debate upon the President's annual message. The gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals, [Mr. MCCRARY,] suggested that, should the House not proceed with the consideration of private business, then the special order which is under his charge would be the business next in order.

Pending these motions, and before either motion could be put, gentlemen upon the other side of the House interposed filibustering motions, a motion to adjourn, and pending that a motion that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next; and upon those motions they called the yeas and nays, which were ordered. One gentleman upon that side of the House stated and reiterated that unless there could be an agreement that the remainder of to-day should be devoted to debate only, no business whatever should be done. He was called to order for that, but the Speaker ruled that the point of order did not lie against him. While that threat was hanging over the House an agreement was entered into at their suggestion, though I understand there is a difference of opinion about that, that all the pending motions should be withdrawn except the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS,] and that the remainder of the day should be devoted to debate only.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to say that if any such threat as the gentleman intimates was made by any one, I did not hear it.

Mr. RANDALL. No such threat was made; the language used was not in any such spirit.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I heard no language that would bear any such construction.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. There need be no discussion about that; the RECORD will show what the language used was. It seemed to me that it was not becoming to the House that a minority should be allowed to determine its order of business. For that reason it seemed proper to me that those on this side of the House who thought that to-day should be devoted to the consideration of business had the same right to filibuster to secure that purpose that gentlemen on the other side of the House had to secure the day for speech-making. It was for that reason that I submitted the motion to adjourn.

I desire to say further that I do not propose to press any such proceedings further, and that I have no objection to any disposition that may be made of the remainder of the day.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS,] that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering the President's annual message. Upon that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I hope the call for the yeas and nays will be withdrawn.

Mr. PAGE. I believe I made the call; and if it is in order I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The House having ordered the yeas and nays to be taken, it is not competent for the gentleman to withdraw the call.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAGE. If it is now in order I will withdraw the call.

The call for the yeas and nays was accordingly withdrawn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, was granted leave of absence for ten days.

GENERAL DEBATE.

The motion of Mr. E. H. ROBERTS was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. TODD in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for debate. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] is entitled to the floor.

CIVIL RIGHTS AND RADICAL USURPATIONS.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that the experiences of our late war, and the legislation we have had by the dominant party since its close, have not strengthened the faith of the intelligent thinkers of the country in the permanency of our republican form of government.

We have seen, sir, and many with dismay, that many of the enactments of Congress were not modeled after the Constitution; not conceived in its spirit, nor fashioned to be within the limits of its warrant; not adopted for the better welfare of the people; but born of ambition, hate, and greed.

It is a dangerous era in the history of any people when fealty to party, and not to the spirit of the organic law, becomes the test of the orthodoxy of patriotism. When representatives, clothed with a high and sacred trust, consult and are controlled in their action more by the behests of a political organization than by their deliberate convictions of justice and right, then liberty is endangered; for the safety, prosperity, and peace of society depend on good government; but just laws cannot be expected, nor constitutional restraint avail, when the welfare of the people is subordinated to the fluctuating necessities of faction.

The modern leaders, sir, have not put their feet "in the tracks of our forefathers," but have essayed to reconstruct the sacred altar of the Constitution; and it has been the tampering of pygmies with the finished and massive work of giants. Ants could burrow under the bases of the mighty pyramids, until their grand poise would be disturbed; and often, in the world's history, has criminal folly undone in a day that which cost the brain-sweat and heart-sweat of wisdom years to perfect.

We have seen usurpation, daring and startling in its character, not only pass unrebuked, but applauded. We have seen, in the case of Louisiana, a great Commonwealth wrecked by the fiat of one man; the pretorian bands gathered there for the assassination of a sovereignty. And again, in the case of Texas, villainy, emboldened by example, attempted a repetition of this outrage; and that State lately stood in humiliating apprehension of ruin, and was spared only by the mere accident of forbearance. The first was accepted at the time as a party triumph, and is defended yet with zeal; and non-intervention in the last by the Chief Executive heard with astonishment, and panegyrized as magnanimity.

The highest judicial tribunal has not escaped the unsparing hand of the reckless reformers; but, thank God, that sanctuary, the last refuge except the sword of the oppressed citizen, is yet free from attempted profanation, and by its utterances gives hope and courage to the almost fainting spirit of liberty. Infractions of the Constitution have been committed time and again without apology, shame, or regret, until the people have become familiarized with usurpation, and lost their sturdy and jealous vigilance and guard of their rights.

Mindful of the past and in full contemplation of the present, I am persuaded that, if the country is to enjoy repose, peace, and prosperity—if we are to perpetuate liberty regulated by law—existing policies and rulers must be changed, or overwhelming disaster is inevitable.

The nation to-day writhes like a sick giant. Her industries are paralyzed, manufactories closed, trade stagnant and demoralized; the fortunes of numbers toppling and falling over the land; thousands of unemployed men, finding no labor for the exercise of their steel-knit muscles, have been parading the streets of our principal cities, raising their hoarse voices for work, and for bread, sir, for their wives and children, pale and hollow-eyed from hunger. The toiling masses of the country, the farmers, have found no market for their products. Corn, tobacco, cotton, and other produce of their fields, or stock prepared for sale—all these have been diminished in value. The purchasing power of money has been doubled by the stringency of the times; the farmers and laborers get poor reward for the sweat of their faces; multitudes cannot pay their debts; bankruptcy has overtaken many and threatens more.

There is something wrong; there is much wrong. The republican party for thirteen years have had full control of the Government; and of the causes of this convulsion of trade, in which the life-blood of labor is sucked out drop by drop and fortunes have vanished like falling stars, I shall speak directly.

When the Congress met in December the whole land was in the throes of monetary revulsion; and what remedies were proposed for the terrible evils under which the people were suffering? Have measures of relief been matured and hurried? No. Although millions upon millions were being lost every month by the multiplied embarrassments of the finances, the cry for succor was unavailing here, and the chairman of the leading committee of this House some time ago expressed his conviction that the duty must be restored on tea and coffee.

Toil on, ye sun-bronzed sons of labor. Wipe the sweat from your aching brows, and stifle if you can the despair filling your hearts, for you must bear your burdens patiently, though the wolf come to your doors. It is not for you the American Congress will first legislate. Your interests are suspended and subordinated to those which concern the darling ward of the Government—the negro; to him the first labors of this body are dedicated. He must be given "civil rights." The bill for this purpose was thrust upon us to the exclusion of every question which the white citizens of three-fourths of the Republic desired should be at once considered and determined; and now, although three months of the session have passed, not one thing has been done as to the finances except the passage of barren resolutions. It seems most probable, and it would, I think, be safe to predict, that no currency bill will be passed during this session. Relief might have been given, but already irreparable harm has been done; capital has fleeced labor; and the blight of the tornado is left all along its track.

Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration reads as follows:

A bill to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whoever, being a corporation or natural person and owner or in charge of any public inn; or of any place of public amusement or entertainment for which a license from any legal authority is required; or of any line of stage-coaches, railroad, or other means of public carriage of passengers or freight; or of any cemetery, or other benevolent institutions, or any public school supported, in whole or in part, at public expense or by endowment for public use, shall make any distinction as to admission or accommodation therein of any citizen of the United States, because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000 for each offense; and the person or corporation so offending shall be liable to the citizens thereby injured in damages, to be recovered in an action of debt.

SEC. 2. That the offenses under this act and actions to recover damages may be prosecuted before any territorial, district, or circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of crimes at the place where the offense was charged to have been committed, as well as in the district where the parties may reside, as now provided by law.

The negro, by congressional enactment, at his option, must be seated with the whites at theaters and public inns, in stage-coaches, railroads, and other public conveyances, admitted to public schools, and buried in cemeteries supported in whole or in part at public expense or by endowment for public use. It is claimed by the friends of this measure that it is authorized by the first and fifth sections of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution, which read as follows:

ARTICLE XIV.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

What are the "privileges and immunities" of citizens of the United States? Section 2 of article 4 of the Constitution is in these words:

The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

These words "privileges and immunities" have received judicial construction. As early as 1823, in the United States circuit court of the district of Pennsylvania, Mr. Justice Washington, in the case of Corfield vs. Coryell, used the following language:

The inquiry is, what are the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States? We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are in their nature fundamental; which belong of right to the citizens of all free governments; and which have at all times been enjoyed by the citizens of the several States which compose this Union, from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are would perhaps be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may, however, be all comprehended under the following general heads: Protection by the Government; the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and to obtain happiness and safety, subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the Government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole; the right of a citizen of one State to pass through or to reside in any other State, for the purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise; to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus; to institute and maintain actions of any kind in the courts of the State; to take, hold, and dispose of property, either real or personal; and an exemption from higher taxes or impositions than are paid by the other citizens of the State, may be mentioned as some of the particular privileges and immunities of citizens which are clearly embraced by the general description of privileges deemed to be fundamental.

The language of Judge Washington has been quoted with approbation by various courts of the country and by the Supreme Court, and it seems clear to my mind, from an analysis of the fourteenth amendment, that it did not enlarge the "privileges and immunities" already conferred, but simply prohibited the States from abridging them.

In January, 1871, Congress, through its Judiciary Committee, in a report upon a memorial praying protection of the claimed right of woman suffrage, gave a construction of the fourteenth amendment. A majority of the committee in their report say:

The clause of the fourteenth amendment, "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States," does not, in the opinion of the committee, refer to privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States other than those privileges and immunities embraced in the original text of the Constitution, article 4, section 2. The fourteenth amendment, it is believed, did not add to the privileges or immunities before mentioned, but was deemed necessary for their enforcement as an express limitation upon the powers of the States. It had been judicially determined that the first eight articles of amendment of the Constitution were not limitations on the powers of the States, and it was apprehended that the same might be held of the provisions of the second section, fourth article.

In the celebrated Slaughter-house case, which came up on appeal from Louisiana, I think it settled beyond all doubt or rational controversy that Congress has no power to legislate as proposed in this bill, and to pass it would be a flagrant invasion of the rights of the States.

The Supreme Court in this case say:

Not only may a man be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a State, but an important element is necessary to convert the former into the latter. He must reside within the State to make him a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born or naturalized in the United States to be a citizen of the Union.

It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

We think this distinction and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of the same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the plaintiffs in error, speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and does not speak of those of citizens of the several States. The argument, however, in favor of the plaintiffs rests wholly on the assumption that the citizenship is the same, and the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the clause are the same.

The language is: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection to the citizen of a State against the legislative power of his own State, that the term "citizen of a State" should be left out when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to "citizens of the United States" in the very sentence which precedes it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose.

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of a State, and what they respectively are, we will presently consider; but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment.

If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States, as such, and those belonging to the citizen of the State, as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested, for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

And they further say:

But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other, and of both these governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

What Mr. Justice Swayne, in his dissenting opinion in this case says of the language of the fourteenth amendment, may be with great propriety applied to the opinion of the court. He says:

No searching analysis is necessary to eliminate its meaning. Its language is intelligible and direct. Nothing can be more transparent. There is no room for construction. There is nothing to construe. Elaboration may obscure, but cannot make clearer, the intent and purpose sought to be carried out.

The court fully appreciated the imposing question they were called to pass upon. They say:

We have given every opportunity for a full hearing at the bar; we have discussed it freely, and compared views among ourselves; we have taken ample time for careful deliberation.

The statement of the case, decided in brief, is about this: The Legislature of Louisiana had passed an act in 1869 incorporating "The Crescent City Live-stock, Landing, and Slaughter-house Company," and by its provisions gave to seventeen persons for a period of twenty-five years the sole and exclusive privilege of conducting and carrying on the live-stock, landing, and slaughter-house business within the limits of the parishes of Orleans, Jefferson, and Saint Bernard, containing an area of eleven hundred and fifty-four square miles and a population of nearly three hundred thousand people. All cattle and other animals destined for sale or slaughter in the city of New Orleans or its environs must be landed at the landings and yards of the company, and be then yarded and sold or slaughtered, the company to be paid prescribed fees and valuable parts of slaughtered animals; and for violation of the provisions of the act the offender is subjected to a fine of $250. This is merely an outline of the act. The State court sustained the constitutionality of the act, and the Supreme Court, in the opinion from which I have quoted, affirm the decision of the lower court. The plaintiffs in error alleged that the statute in question was a violation of the Constitution of the United States in several particulars:

1. That it created an involuntary servitude forbidden by the thirteenth article of amendment;

2. That it abused the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States;

3. That it denied the plaintiffs the equal protection of the laws; and,

4. That it deprived them of their property without due process of law, contrary to the first section of the fourteenth article of amendment.

It has been urged in argument here that the constitutional question involved in the civil-rights bill now before Congress was not decided by the Supreme Court in the case I have referred to. Let us see what the dissenting justices say was the question before them.

Mr. Justice Field, in his dissenting opinion, says:

The fourteenth amendment, in my judgment, makes it essential to the validity of the legislation of every State that the equality of right should be respected. How widely this equality of right has been departed from; how entirely rejected and trampled on by the act of Louisiana, I have already shown. And it is to me a matter of profound regret that it is recognized by a majority of this court, for by it the right of free labor, one of the most sacred and imprescriptible rights of man, is violated.

Mr. Justice Bradley says, in his dissenting opinion:

The constitutional question is distinctly raised in these cases. The constitutional right is expressly claimed; it was wholly violated by State law, which was sustained by the State court, and we are called upon in a legitimate and proper way to afford redress. Our jurisdiction and our duty are imperative.

Mr. Justice Swayne, in his dissenting opinion, says:

The first section of the fourteenth amendment is alone involved in the consideration of this case. * * * * * * *

The construction adopted by the majority of my brethren is much too narrow. It defeats, by a limitation not anticipated, the intent of those by whom the instrument was framed, and of those by whom it was adopted. To the extent of that limitation it turns, as it were, what was meant for bread into a stone. * * *

But this arm of our jurisdiction is stricken down by the judgment thus given. Nowhere than in this court ought the will of the nation, as thus expressed, to be more liberally construed or more cordially executed. This determination of the majority seems to me to be far in the other direction.

Such, say the learned judges, were the questions involved; such the extent, effect, intention of the judgment rendered by the majority of the court. Yet the majority of this Congress, diseased with chronic audacity in usurpation, propose to break over this wall of law, built up by master-mechanics of their own selection. This authoritative binding exposition of constitutional power, defining its boundary and limiting its action, is scouted here.

At the same term of the Supreme Court of the United States the case of Bradwell vs. The State was decided. The plaintiff in this case, a woman, had made application to the judges of the supreme court of Illinois for license to practice law, presenting her certificate of character, and that on due examination she had been found to possess the requisite qualifications. The judges refused her a license, and the case was brought to the Supreme Court of the United States. Hon. M. H. CARPENTER, now a member of the Senate, was counsel for plaintiff. In his argument, as reported in the case, he urged this proposition:

The State Legislature could not, in enumerating the qualifications, require the candidate (for license to practice law) to be a white citizen. This would be the exclusion of all colored citizens, without regard to age, character, or learning. Yet no sound mind can draw a distinction between such an act and a custom, usage, or law of a State which denies this privilege to all female citizens, without regard to age, character, or learning; for if the Legislature may declare that no female citizen shall practice law, it may as well declare that no colored citizen shall practice law; for the only provision of the Constitution of the United States which secures to colored male citizens of the United States the privileges of admission to the bar, or the pursuit of the other ordinary avocations of life, is the provision "that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of a citizen." And if this provision does protect the colored citizen, then it protects every citizen, black and white, male and female.

And he further says:

All the privileges and immunities which I vindicate to the colored citizen I vindicate to our mothers, wives, and daughters.

The court in their opinion in this case say:

In regard to that amendment (the fourteenth) counsel for the plaintiff in this court truly says that there are certain privileges and immunities which belong to a citizen of the United States as such; otherwise it would be nonsense for the fourteenth amendment to prohibit a State from abridging them; and he proceeds to argue that admission to the bar of a State of a person who possesses the requisite learning and character is one of those which a State may not deny.

In this latter proposition we are not able to concur with counsel. We agree with him that there are privileges and immunities belonging to citizens of the United States in that relation and character, and that it is these and these alone which a State is forbidden to abridge. But the right to admission to practice in the courts of a State is not one of them. This right in no sense depends upon citizenship of the United States. It has not, so far as we know, ever been made in any State, or in any case, to depend on citizenship at all. Certainly many prominent and distinguished lawyers have been admitted to practice, both in State and Federal courts, who were not citizens of the United States or of any State. But on whatever basis this right may be placed, so far as it can have any relation to citizenship at all, it would seem that, as to the courts of a State it would relate to citizenship of the State; and as to Federal courts, it would relate to citizenship of the United States.

The opinion just delivered in the Slaughter-house cases renders elaborate argument in the present case unnecessary; for, unless we are wholly and radically mistaken in the principles on which those cases are decided, the right to control and regulate the granting of license to practice law in the courts of a State is one of those powers which are not transferred for its protection to the Federal Government, and its exercise is in no manner governed or controlled by citizenship of the United States in the party seeking such license.

It is unnecessary to repeat the argument on which the judgment in those cases is founded. It is sufficient to say they are conclusive of the present case.

The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution did not make the negro a voter. The second section of that amendment recognizes the right of the State to exclude him from the polls, but affixes the penalty of a reduced basis of representation in such States as denied him suffrage. It took the fifteenth amendment to give him the right to vote. The fourteenth amendment did not enlarge the privileges and immunities of the citizen, but denies to the State the right to abridge them. What they are has been judicially determined. It has been decided in Massachusetts that this constitutional provision does not apply to marriage and divorce; in New Jersey that it does not interfere with her right to regulate fishing on her navigable rivers; and in Ohio and Connecticut that it does not apply to systems of school education established by the States.

The first eleven amendments to the Constitution, adopted so soon after the original instrument was approved, most carefully guard the States against the encroachments of Federal power. The statesmen of that day, with far-reaching wisdom, saw the danger, and provided the bulwarks.

Let us read something of that forgotten instrument:

ART. 9. The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

ART. 10. The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

This bill is at war with the theory, letter, and genius of the Constitution. It creates offenses and punishes them before its courts. But consolidation goes on with unpausing step. The passage of this act may be regarded as a party triumph, but it will prove a national disaster. It will prove as fruitless of good results to the negro as it is vicious in principle. The strength and beauty of our Government are in the affectionate devotion of the people; and, considering the variety of its population, the extent and diversity of the States in climate, soil, and interests, it will require the wisest statesmanship to harmonize the whole and perpetuate it in the fullness of peace and freedom to coming generations. It is one of the delegated powers. The Constitution had to be ratified by the States before they became subject to its provisions; and any one refusing might have established for itself an independent form of government. The theory of the founders of this imposing fabric is too far forgotten now. States are esteemed of no more significance in the Union than counties in a State; the careful constitutional balance of the powers of the several branches of government disregarded; the spirit of centralization becoming year after year stronger and bolder; and soon the nation, as radical orators love to speak of it, will merge into despotism, if the aggressive march of usurpation be not checked.

Great demoralization of public sentiment followed the war. Victory, plunder, and power intoxicated the people. Public virtue fled, and the carnival of thieves followed. The Constitution was in effect suspended, despised, mocked; and the guilty schemes of corruption, fostered and executed by the Jacobin adventurers, whom the reversing chances of revolution had put to the front, abashed and struck with terror the powerless conservatism of the land.

Judicial murder was committed. I use strong language, sir, and mean just what I say. Judicial murder was committed by the hanging of a woman in this city, by the judgment of a military court that had no jurisdiction, upon testimony which no honest jury could have accepted as half sufficient.

Accusation against any, lacking in the least in the virtues of that loyalty which, like charity, covers a multitude of faults, was sufficient to insure the victim either death or the horrors of the prison-house. We have lately seen that conscience, with her whip of scorpions, has been at work with some of the participants in this tragedy; and they have appeared before the country with criminations and recriminations, excusing themselves for "the deep damnation of her taking off;" but neither the subtle, artful, malignant genius of the fiend, nor the ravings of the pitiless debauchee, will avail either to escape the just judgment of mankind upon the awful deed that doth vex their souls.

The precedent established by this court has been approved by the present Law Department of the Government, and the chief of that Department nominated by the President as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, but not confirmed by the Senate.

Sir, until very recently the pleasure of the Chief Executive in all things has been obeyed by all who were fattening on the bounty of the Government, and we have witnessed the fawning servility of party to the behests of its leaders. Only of late has the least insubordination to his mandates appeared. The army of office-holders, the radical press of the country, the rank and file of the party, have been swift to sustain every encroachment on the Constitution and the rights of the States; and, in my opinion, so lost have been the masses to any regard for constitutional restraint, so debauched by office and schemes of speculation and plunder, that it needed only Cæsar's genius and courage in planning the mode and selecting the hour, to have brought this country to the feet of a proclaimed despotism, to be followed by the cheering "All hail" to a self-inaugurated autocrat.

Look you, I invite, over the land; when fire and sword had swept the South, did her graves, orphanage, widowhood, her cruel desolation, move her conquerors either to pity or justice? No; but hordes of adventurers were turned loose upon that stricken people, and through the operation of reconstruction laws; by means of the taxes levied upon her by Government, and the infamous jobs and exactions of venal Legislatures, poverty-cursed as she was, a tribute has been wrung from her greater than that required of rich but vanquished France by the victorious Prussians. Several of these States are Africanized, and many of them ruined by the oppressions of negro and carpet-bag rule. I will state but one instance as a sample.

In South Carolina the taxable property has declined in value from $500,000,000 to $175,000,000; the taxes have risen from $400,000 to $2,500,000, and the people are compelled to pay twenty times as much as before the war. The bonded debt has trebled; the floating debt is unknown; the legislative expenses have risen from $40,000 to $300,000, and the public printing from $5,000 to $330,000. A most appalling exhibit!

Look again at Louisiana. Daughter of the sun, favored by climate and soil, and rich in matchless resources; once happy with her perfumed orange groves, her fields of cane, thousands of acres of growing cotton waving as the great white banners of her pride, industry, and wealth, with the mighty Father of Waters bearing to her marts the products of the South and West, and the Gulf opening to her the commerce of the world; her mighty forests, standing as silent guards of her magnificent repose; her lovely lakes, mirroring the peace and beauty of heaven, not then discolored by blood shed in domestic strife; her ruling class, more versed in the graceful culture and amenities of a polite civilization than devoted to the barbaric rites and mysteries of voodouism; her Crescent City, queen of that realm of trade and chivalry, the emporium of immense traffic—river, gulf, and railroad all pouring their tributes into her lap; but to-day, discrowned, and how changed! Her scepter, her robes, and her jewels stolen; fallen from her high estate; holding life and property at the mercy and caprice of her oppressors; taxes almost insupportable levied; property depreciated until it is valueless; a usurping Legislature legalized by the unwarrantable orders of a drunken judge—she is the victim of a conspiracy of plunderers, sustained by the bayonets of this Government. Outraged, with weeping eyes and bleeding breast, there she lies, ravished of fortune and free government, to gratify the infernal and remorseless lust of her oppressors for gold and power.

The history of the dominant party is blackened throughout with shameless misrule, violence, and favoritism. You have created monopolies dangerous to a free Government. Millions of acres of the public domain have been given away to enrich railroad corporations composed of a few individuals. Under the national banking law, a most dangerous organization of capital has been effected, and millions of dollars have been amassed at the expense of the people, and in this the usual injustice to South and West committed—refused an equal distribution of this currency—they receiving only $37,000,000 against $213,000,000 to Pennsylvania, New York, and New England. These banks drawing gold interest on their bonds, and loaning their currency at high rates to the people, are absorbing the wealth of the land. With $353,000,000 of capital united by a common bond of interest, their power is formidable for mischief; they can spare nearly $20,000,000 every year if necessary as a corruption fund, and still receive over 10 per cent. profit on capital invested.

By the ingenious arrangement and operation of your system of tariff and internal-revenue laws, the East is enriched, the South and West are having the life-blood sucked from them. You have repealed the income tax. The people of these sections were too poor to have incomes, but you had, and this law touched your pockets, which have marvelous sensitiveness. By reason of a heavy tariff on what we use in living, and in our industries, on much that we eat and drink, and all that we wear and labor with, we pay tribute to northern manufacturers. Taxation in this insidious form, and in manifold other ways, is on everything—your fortunes swelling yearly, and the West and South made "hewers of wood and drawers of water," with their strength sapped in every vein, suffering as the adventurer in the cave in the clutches of the devil-fish, so graphically described in the thrilling romance of Victor Hugo.

Sir John Culpeper, in the Long Parliament of England, speaking of the then existing monopolies of the people in his country, said:

> They are a nest of wasps—a swarm of vermin which have overcrept the land Like the frogs of Egypt they have gotten possession of our dwellings, and we have scarce a room free from them. They sup in our cup; they dip in our dish; they sit by our fire; we find them in the dye-fat, wash-bowl, and powdering tub. They share with the butler in the box. They will not bait us a pin. We may not buy our clothes without their brokage. These are the leeches that have sucked the commonwealth so hard that it is almost hectical.

This homely but vigorous language could be fully applied to the oppressions of the monopolies and tax burdens of our own land.

Of the $116,000,000 raised under the internal-revenue system, whisky and tobacco pay ninety-six millions. You say these are luxuries; so they are, but these taxes at last are a toll on the producers of corn and tobacco.

Under the operation, too, of your patent laws immense sums are paid by the people to enrich a few who have been already trebly rewarded for their inventions. It has been stated here as true that sewing-machines, sold here from fifty to eighty dollars each, are shipped to France, and the same there sold for twenty-five dollars, the manufacturers pocketing this immense profit by reason of existing laws.

Thus, suffering as the people of the South and West are, under operation of invidious, discriminating, and partial enactments, you wish now further to humilitate and damage them by passing this civil-rights bill.

I think what I have quoted from the decisions of the Supreme Court makes it as clear as could be demonstrated that you have no power to pass this law. Its effect will be disastrous in many States. In my own State it will utterly destroy the magnificent school system we enjoy, and for the maintenance of which the negro does not pay a dollar. He is at peace. The whites feel kindly toward him. God knows I would do him no injustice whatever, but aid him all in my power. I know such to be the feeling of the people of my district and State. If you pass this law, whenever a negro enters a free school it will close it. What changes the future may work I cannot predict, but for the present the white people of Kentucky are not educated up to that happy degree of "fraternity and equality" which will reconcile them to send their sons and daughters to the same schools with negroes. The children themselves would rebel against this. Pass and enforce this law, and the consequence will be that the children of the poor white men, who rely on the free schools for education, will grow up in ignorance. Those who have wealth can and will hire private teachers and establish private schools.

The passage of this law I do not believe is desired by the negroes generally of my State. The effect of it will be to antagonize the whites and blacks, and it will work to the injury and disadvantage of the negroes. I can see in its enforcement the most harmful consequences. The machinery of the Federal courts will be set in motion, spies and informers will swarm, arrests and harassments in varied forms will follow, and the peace of society be upturned.

You have few negroes in the Northern States; but though you profess to love them much, I find none of them in your State Legislatures, or as judges, or filling other State offices, and none sent by your people to Congress. Why is this? Why, in Massachusetts no one can vote who cannot write his name and read the constitution—and that rule applied to the States of the South would put your party in a minority in the Government, as in the last presidential election a majority of the white vote was cast against President Grant.

You have used the negro, not to elevate him but to aggrandize yourselves, and now you would pet the steed you have ridden so far. Whenever the negroes have had power, detriment to both white and black has resulted. The condition of the South proves this. I think they are beginning to learn that it is only as voters that they are needed by you. I make this prediction, that you will rue the day you enfranchised them; for before many years they will be an element of strength to your political adversaries. The intelligence and influence of the whites among whom they live, who advise them, aid, and employ them, who really are their only true friends, will ultimately accomplish this result. When the novelty of their changed situation shall wear off; when they more clearly shall see what a sham your professed friendship for them is; when they shall understand that their interests are the same as those of the whites among whom they have their homes, then this new adjustment of parties will occur, and all this tampering with the Constitution "return to plague the inventor."

I love my country. All we have yet accomplished is but the dawning of the magnificent destiny attainable if we be but true to the fixed principles of government. Let us, like true knights, reverently guard the Constitution from violation, as in the beautiful legend the Holy Grail was guarded; and may it, like the sacred cup, escape any touch that would profane it. We are dealing with questions of august magnitude and dignity, and the consequences of our action concern the household gods of every citizen. The council of war, held preceding the battle, by the ten Athenian generals on the mountain side overlooking the plains of Marathon, on which were encamped the hosts of the Persian army, was not more important as affecting the civilization and the destiny of nations than will be the action of this Congress on the future history of America. Let us not sow that which may crop out in a brood of heresies and horrors. Let us meet the issues with manliness, honesty, and firmness; not with prejudice, selfishness, and buffoonery. The wag is an anachronism here—come before or behind his time.

As you have voted for general amnesty in this branch of Congress, let not your party elsewhere couple with it the conditions of the civil-rights bill. Much must be done and undone, or your proposed celebration of the centennial at Philadelphia will be a painful mockery. You will feel it, perhaps. Place amid the banners and flags of your festooned walls on that occasion the photograph of the South Carolina Legislature, and by its side the portrait of Calhoun; and here again the picture of Louisiana's law-makers, and along with it the likeness of the warrior Jackson; and in the galleries, grouped as spectators of the "swelling scene," that band of outlawed men, chief among them that loved Bayard, General Breckinridge of my State; and, amid your patriotic festivities it would be refreshing and instructive for one of your orators, "to point a moral or adorn a tale," to refer to the voiceless pictures as a proof of the progress of statesmanship, and to the living men as attesting the fact of your magnanimity.

Mr. Chairman, I think the people are rallying to the rescue of constitutional liberty, to reform the abuses and retrench the extravagance with which they have been cursed. Let us return to the simplicity, honesty, and economy of the old time. Let every patriot proclaim, in the language of Burke, "I put my feet in the tracks of our forefathers, where I can neither wander nor stumble."

Mr. MILLIKEN obtained the floor, and said: I yield a moment to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOLFE.]

Mr. WOLFE. I have prepared some remarks on the finances of the country, which I ask leave to have printed as part of to-day's debate.

There being no objection, leave was granted. (See Appendix.)

Mr. MILLIKEN resumed the floor.

Mr. RAINEY. I ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I cannot yield now at the commencement of my remarks. The gentleman must excuse me at present.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope, then, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MILLIKEN] will, when he concludes his remarks, yield to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RAINEY,] who wants to have a letter read.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will yield now, if it will take but a few minutes; but I shall claim the right to interpose whenever this interruption goes beyond a reasonable time.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, it will be patent to the House after the reading of the letter which I send to the desk——

Mr. MILLIKEN. I cannot yield for any remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky having yielded, and the gentleman from South Carolina having taken the floor, the gentleman from Kentucky cannot now withdraw his consent.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I yielded upon the condition that a letter should be read; but the gentleman commences by making remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Kentucky to yield to the gentleman from South Carolina for five minutes.

Mr. MILLIKEN. No, sir; for a moment or two, to allow a letter to be read.

Mr. RAINEY. Then, if gentlemen on the other side are afraid to have a few words from this side of the House in reply to the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BROWN,] I will simply send this letter to the desk to be read. I want it to go on record with the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the country may know who has made that speech and who wrote this letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

ELIZABETHTOWN, April 18, 1861.

Editors Louisville Courier:

My attention has been called to the following paragraph which appeared in your paper of this date:

"JOHN YOUNG BROWN'S POSITION.—This gentleman, in reply to some searching interrogatories put to him by Governor Helm, said, in reference to the call of the President for four regiments of volunteers to march against the South, 'I would not send one solitary man to aid that Government; and those who volunteer should be shot down in their tracks.'"

This ambiguous report of my remarks has, I find, been misunderstood by some who have read it, who construe my language to apply to the government of the Confederate States. What I did say was this:

"Not one man or one dollar will Kentucky furnish Lincoln to aid him in his unholy war against the South. If this northern Army shall attempt to cross our borders, we will resist it until death; and if one man shall be found in our Commonwealth to volunteer to join them, he ought, and I believe will, be shot down before he leaves the State."

This was not said in reply to any question propounded by ex-Governor Helm, as you have stated, and is no more than I frequently uttered publicly and privately prior to my debate with him.

Respectfully,

JOHN YOUNG BROWN.

Mr. RAINEY. As the privilege of debate is at present denied me, I may take advantage of some future occasion.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I yield one minute to the gentleman from the District of Columbia [Mr. CHIPMAN.]

Mr. CHIPMAN. I had intended to submit some remarks upon the relations which the Government of the United States bears to the District of Columbia; but as I do not feel able to address the House at any length to-day, I ask unanimous consent to have my remarks printed as part of the proceedings.

There being no objection, leave was granted. (See Appendix.)

[Mr. MILLIKEN addressed the House on the bill (H. R. No. 477) to establish an educational fund, and to apply the proceeds of the public lands to the education of the people. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

THE MONEY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MELLISH. Mr. Chairman, prelusory to what I propose to address to the House on the subject of the money of the United States, I will without immediate comment state two propositions:

If paper money is provided by the Government, it should be a legal tender, and receivable for all public dues, and it need not be redeemable in metallic money.

If paper money is issued by private corporations, it should not be a legal tender, not receivable fo public dues, and should be redeemable in metallic money.

The real reason paper money was formerly so much in discredit was because Government abandoned the issue of it to individuals and private corporations. It allowed the circulation of the country to be filled up with irresponsible paper without any check but that most unavailable one, of being liable to be called upon for specie; and by the circumstances existing, people were forced to take paper money that was not a legal tender, and in most of the States when the bank broke the holders of its bills found them worthless. We have partially reformed the old system; we have a semi-national currency. Let us go on and perfect the work by providing the people an exclusive national circulating medium.

Laws are assumed to be passed to cure some mischief or attain some properly desired end or object. They should be construed liberally, with a view of curing the mischief or attaining the end; and the courts in deciding upon the intention of the legislative body should weigh the language of the statute in the scale of the period in which the language was used.

When the Constitution was adopted the word "money" meant (as the history of the times will show) irredeemable paper money, paper money at a discount, all manner of foreign coins, and perhaps a variety of domestic and colonial coins.

One of the evils of the situation was the wretched character of the circulating medium. With the view of curing this mischief the people, in the adoption of the Constitution, conferred upon Congress the enumerated power to regulate the value, and imposed upon it the duty to regulate the value of money. In order that there should be efficient action in that direction, they conferred upon Congress the power to pass all laws necessary and proper (in the discretion of Congress) to regulate the value of money. The law above all others best calculated to give value to and regulate the value of money is the law declaring it a legal tender.

A law requiring money (paper money) to be redeemed in gold or silver sometimes makes the money better, sometimes worse; in other words, sometimes more valuable, sometimes less, depending upon the condition of the currency, the banks, and the business of the people at the time.

A statute passed this month requiring all greenbacks and bank-notes to be redeemed on demand in gold and silver on and after April 1 would raise the mischief with the currency, the business, the people, and the Treasury of the country.

If anybody asks whether a currency irredeemable in specie can be of any value, could he not be answered that a standard of value is never redeemable by force of law? If made redeemable, it would not be a standard. Perhaps the interrogator would from the answer learn for the first time that gold and silver government coin is never redeemable.

Let the sovereign authority authorize paper currency, establish its denominations, declare it a standard of value in all transactions, require all banks to receive it at its face value on deposit, and declare it to be a tender in payment of all debts public and private, and such a currency would be (if the volume were guarded against excess) as valuable in the market as gold, and much more useful as money than gold itself.

In considering this bill, which involves questions affecting all the most valuable interests of life, in its constitutional bearings, we are brought face to face with the question, what is money? Nothing is, in a constitutional sense, money but what will pay debts. Everything else is commodity, and the transactions in the absence of money are barter. Money is the thing which, by the law of the land and the sovereign authority, must be received by every creditor in the discharge of and compensation for his demand. That thing is money, and nothing else is, in the sense meant by money when we are talking about a legal tender.

The time was when silver was not only the standard of value, but it was the circulating medium, and gold was a mere commodity; and the difficulties of carrying on commercial transactions with silver, both as a standard and as a medium of circulation, were so great that ingenuity sought out relief and brought gold in, because it was a commodity more valuable in the market than silver, pound for pound. And the introduction of it has been to aggravate the effects that that were felt in the use of silver. It is claimed by the financiers of England—the men best fitted from their habits, experience, and education to judge—that the substitution of gold for silver as a standard was exceedingly mischievous to the welfare of Great Britain. Relief was sought from the difficulties felt by making both a standard, when it was immediately discovered that there was a striking incongruity in making two articles a standard of value which were subject to fluctuation in the market, so that they did not agree for any length of time in relative value. The commercial men and bankers got along with the dual standard, in a measure, by devising an agio; that is, a rate of difference between gold and silver, which little complication had to enter into every transaction.

What is money?

Webster, in his Dictionary, gives this definition:

1. Coin; stamped metal; pieces of metal, usually gold, silver, or copper, stamped by public authority, and used as the medium of commerce.
2. Hence, any currency usually and lawfully employed in buying and selling as the equivalent of money, as bank-notes and the like.

Money was originally stamped coin, and afterward anything that generally takes its place in buying and selling.

And the Encyclopædia Britannica gives this definition:

Money, the name given to the commodities or articles which the people of different countries universally accept, either voluntarily or by compulsion, as equivalents for their services and for whatever else they may have to dispose of.

Worcester, in his Dictionary, says:

Money, originally stamped coin, is now applied to whatever serves as a circulating medium, including bank-notes and drafts, as well as metallic coin.

Appleton's New American Cyclopedia gives the following:

Money, the medium of exchange used by any people; at the present day, among civilized nations, confined entirely to metallic coins and bank-notes.

The goodness of the last definition, which is at variance with most others, may, doubtless, be questioned.

Rees's Cyclopedia gives this definition:

Money, in commerce, is a general term for coin, paper, or any other measure of value or representative of property, that passes current from hand to hand as a circulating medium.

Hume says money is the representative of labor and commodities.

Chambers's Encyclopedia says:

Before anything is money, it must be such that you can go into the market and immediately use it in purchasing commodities or paying debts. It is of the essence of money that it is capable of making immediate payment, either to satisfy a seller or creditor. If a thing serve the purpose of buying or paying debt, it really is money.

Sir James Stuart, whose work preceded Adam Smith's, says:

Money, which I call of account, is no more than a scale of equal parts, invented for the purpose of measuring the respective value of things vendible.

Dr. Kelly, in his first edition of the Camblet, says:

Moneys of account may be considered with respect to coins, as weights and measures with respect to goods, or as a mathematical scale with respect to maps, lines, or other geometrical figures; hence moneys of account are the measures of value both of merchandise and of the metals themselves, whether in coin or bullion, and thus serve as an invariable scale in all fluctuations in price.

Craig's Universal Dictionary:

Money, metal coined for the purposes of commerce; usually stamped with the name and arms of the prince or state that directs it to pass current; the circulating medium of a state, whether as coin or paper, either being considered as the representative of property. Bank-notes or bills of credit, issued by authority and exchangeable for coin or redeemable, are also called money.

C. J. Smith, in his Synonyms Discriminated:

Money is employed for anything which is used as a circulating medium. In some parts of Africa, for instance, shells are used as money.

The Imperial Dictionary, (edited by John Ogilvie:)

Money, any representative of property, anything adapted to serve as a universal equivalent for all countries, and for which individuals readily exchange their surplus products; the circulating medium. If a man pays in hand for goods in bank-notes or paper currency, he is said to pay in ready money.

In the definition of the word "money" in the Imperial Dictionary it is observed that—

The use of a paper currency as a substitute for a metallic currency is accompanied with several advantages. It enables mercantile men and others to effect payments at all distances with great facility, safety, and dispatch, and with little expense; whereas the employment of gold and silver coin for the same purpose would be attended with great inconvenience, expense, risk, and delay, besides the expense of the wear and tear of the coin.

Richard Soule, in his English Synonyms:

Money, coin, (or its representative,) cash, circulating medium, standard of value.

The British Cyclopedia:

Money, the common medium of exchange among civilized nations.

Money, then, is the article which, by the law of the land, the sovereign authority, is declared to be, and the declaration enforced practically, a tender in payment of debts, public and private. That is the money of the country. Money is the measure of all values established by law, and enforced by sovereign authority as a tender in payment of all obligations. The whole thing rests in the confidence in the power, stability, and perpetuity of the Government. Without that you can have no standard. As security for our circulating medium gold cannot be necessary, provided that circulation be otherwise based so as to prevent the possibility of loss or depreciation. Gold, as a standard or circulating medium, is neither necessary nor useful for the stability or convenience of our monetary system. To doubt that a currency founded on the credit of the nation, receivable by the Government in payment of taxes, and made a legal tender in the payment of debts, is to doubt the integrity and stability of the Union.

A fair analysis will show that a distrust of the possibility of the creation of such a currency is a distrust of the good faith of the Republic.

The greatest variety of things since the world began has been money, according to this definition. Wampum, beads, beaver-skins, shells, iron, leather, parchment, copper, and all the compounds of copper and brass which represent bronze, silver, nickel, gold, and almost every manner of alloy of these, may be found in the history of the world to have been money; because they were by the authority of the country which issued them in the land in which they were issued tender in the payment of debts; and for no other reason; never because of their intrinsic value.

In answer to the question that is sometimes asked, whether there is any other distinctive quality in money than that it is by law and sovereign authority a legal tender in payment of debts, I would say that I am not able to see that there is any other quality than that which is peculiar to money as distinct from other commodities.

A thing being made a legal tender, and receivable for all public and private debts, must inevitably have value; and that value is a value directly as money. The legal tender, under the system we are considering, has no quality that will occasion it to rise or fall in value outside of the fact that it is money. The people get a measure of value that is not subject to change by extraneous circumstances, and cannot be withdrawn from this country by the exigency of foreign populations. It will be of one value in every part of our wide-spread domain, and in the purse of every citizen.

The dollar is the unit of our currency. All denominations above that are multiples, all below are fractions. Our dollar is about the same as the dollar of all the world, conventionally fixed by the custom of merchants. It is the conventional unit of value. When we want to see what a dollar of gold is—it is according to the statute-books so much gold and of so much fineness. And when we want to get at what is a Spanish dollar, we find it so much silver of so much fineness. Go along to some other country, and it is some other standard. It is a theoretical method of adjustment, just as the franc is in France, and the thaler is in Germany, and other coins in other countries. If anybody wants to know what the United States standard dollar represents, the answer is sufficient that in the power to pay debts, taxes, and in its purchasing power the standard currency provides a dollar that is at least equivalent to a gold dollar, the component parts of which and its weight can be found out at the Mint. Is it asked what it is worth? The answer is, it is worth, for all the purposes of a currency, at least the amount of the gold dollar coined in the Mint of the United States, and will pay a debt as quickly.

The unit of measure is a conventional thing; the unit of weight is a conventional thing. The unit of weight is referable to a thing of no value; it is equal to so much distilled water of no exchangeable value. The gold of a gold dollar is not worth intrinsically one dollar; it gets not a little of its worth from its conventional and legal value. It is turned into bullion for transactions with foreign countries; and gold goes up and down, perhaps in not as great degree, but not with less constant variance, than other commodities.

I recollect in New Orleans, in 1858, the bills of the banks were worth more than silver coinage. I have myself paid a premium on hundreds of United States half-dollars to get them exchanged for paper currency. I think the rate was as high as 2 or 2¼ per cent., right over the counter of the bank that issued the bills. And Bank of England notes are to-day at a premium on the continent of Europe over gold.

We have found it difficult enough to discover any standard of value. I have yet to discover the man bright enough to show any standard of value of the thing which is called a dollar. If there is anything by which it can be measured it has not yet been discovered. It is equally difficult to discover standards for the meanings of words.

And yet all laws, the most and the least important, must be expressed in language, and the words of the law must be interpreted by some standard. The human mind has been exercised upon it ever since the dawn of civilization, and the best standard, as I believe, yet discovered, is expressed in the familiar phrase:

> We yield to custom, whose arbitrary sway
> Words and the force of language must obey.

The wisest courts and the soundest in interpreting language refer to the contemporaneous history to ascertain how the words were used when the law was enacted. By that rule we should be required to consider what was meant by the word "money" at the time the Constitution was adopted. The framers of that Constitution, and the people who thereafter voted upon it and approved it, had an idea of what was intended by money. And it meant in those days all those things which among trading people, and all people who were sufficiently advanced to have any other form of transaction except barter, were used in the transactions of sale between man and man. Paper money was no novelty. It had existed for long periods and in various forms, and actually existed in this country at the time; and no man at that time spoke of money without including in his meaning all that which was used as money. If we seek a priori for a true definition of money, we shall be compelled to admit that the essence of the word "money" was that which was a tender in payment of debts. It would be difficult for anybody to imagine anything that was money that would not pay debts and purchase property.

Now, then, upon either definition—that established by custom, and in use and understood at the time this Constitution was made, or the more restricted definition to which I have referred, as an article lawfully established as a tender in the payment of debts—it is not competent to deny that paper money is intended by the Constitution. The peculiar provision of the Constitution which prohibited the States from making anything else but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts plainly intimates that it was supposed by the framers of the Constitution that, if they were not prohibited, they would make paper tender, or something else; and being wise enough to know that if it were permitted to the States there might be presently a large number of different things elevated into the dignity of tender in the payment of debts by the States, by the exclusion of the States they reserved to themselves the power to make something else than gold and silver a tender in the payment of debts. To say that money meant only gold and silver is flying in the face of the meaning of the word "money" as at that time understood. To assert that the word "money" did not cover paper money is quarreling with the most common methods of interpretation.

What is money? Just those things that by the custom of communities or the authority of government are a tender in payment of debts. If Washington, Franklin, Hamilton, and Jefferson were alive they would witness that the principal money dealt in in their time was paper money. Money takes its value and its quality as a measure of value from the sovereignty that issues it. In this country it is necessary for the prosperity and welfare of the people that the Government should afford them a currency. No other authority but the Government is authorized to do it. It is a duty of the Government to do it, and the power is conferred.

The express power granted in the Constitution to regulate the value of money carries with it the implied power to do anything that is appropriate and necessary for the purpose of regulating the value of it. The human mind cannot conceive any quality possessed by money so important to the regulation of its value as the provision that it shall be a legal tender in the payment of all debts, dues, demands. In fact, that quality, I venture to say, is the only distinguishing feature of money. I mean by that it is the feature that is indispensable to take money out of the category of commodities; and unless it is enjoyed by money, all transactions in which the so-called money lacking that quality is employed would be transactions of barter.

Now I state this dogmatically, for the purpose of calling the attention of critics, and to ascertain whether there is any quality in money that distinguishes it from commodities except the legal quality that is conferred upon it when it is proclaimed by the sovereign authority or conventional usage as a tender in payment of debt. And it should be observed, and I am astonished that it is not more noticed, that the one reason why the rate of interest is fixed by law by enlightened and sovereign authorities grows out of the fact that the law and the sovereign authority make money a legal tender, and therefore an absolute necessary of life, for which there is no substitute; and hence the rate for the use of money is fixed by law. The reason given is that the law and Constitution have made it so absolutely necessary for the use of mankind that there is no substitute for it. It makes whatever it is conferred upon the measure of values that passes between members of the community.

The only thing to be looked at with care is whether paper can be made a tender in payment of debts. That seems to me as plain a provision of constitutional law as ever was broached.

Referring to the powers of the Government to provide the money of the United States and regulate the value thereof, if we analyze the constitutional provisions on that subject, it will be found that they are primarily divided into enumerated and implied powers. All the enumerated powers are comprehensive. None of the enumerated powers are operative by their own virtue and force. They would be a dead letter unless aided by congressional action through the implied powers; and the interposition and action of Congress are necessary to determine the measures that are essential and proper to carry into effect the enumerated powers. Without such action the enumerated powers are dead, inert, and valueless. The implied powers are as important and as necessary as the enumerated powers. Neither is good without the other. The implied powers bear the same relation to our constitutional organization as the heart and lungs and brains bear to the animal system. It is a dead body without the presence and organization of implied powers. They furnish the vitality, the force, and the direction of the whole machinery.

Under the constitutional provision that Congress has power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, no money can be had unless it is provided through the exercise of the implied powers under the Constitution. The power of regulating the value of money has been exercised from the beginning by congressional action, in which Congress has exercised to the full extent the implied powers necessary and proper for the purpose, and without the exercise of which we could have had no money. The standard and the form and the nominal value of the currency have been fixed; penal laws have been passed protecting it from deterioration, from counterfeiting, and have been enforced in all Federal courts against it. These laws are not based upon any express power conferred in the Constitution, but upon the implied power of doing those things that are proper and necessary to be done to carry into effect the enumerated powers of the Constitution.

Take the power to create post-offices and post-roads. Without the implied powers of the Constitution, no elaboration of a system of post-offices and a mail service could exist. Under the implied powers, a vast number of penal laws have been passed by Cengress and enforced. Men have been sent to prison and had all manner of punishment for the violation of laws, not under the express powers of the Constitution, but under the implied powers. If there is any power whatever for the Government to issue any form of paper obligation for the payment of money and for the redemption of that obligation, there is an implied power attending it as a matter of course—that is whatever is essential, and especially that act which is indispensable to fix the value of that obligation, is within the power of Congress to apply.

When the Constitution provided a prohibition upon all States to issue bills of credit and to make anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts, it retained to the people through Congress the power that was inhibited to the States. That is to say, it retained the power to Congress to make something other than gold and silver a tender in payment of debts. It would not trust the States with the power to issue bills of credit, or make anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts; and by that single act reserved to the United States the right to do both. If the United States have not that power, they lack the highest quality of a sovereignty; and there is no power among all the people of the United States to exercise the very highest attribute of sovereignty; that is to say, to regulate the value of money.

When a power is conferred by the Constitution the duty of exercising it is correlative. The mandate of the Constitution which orders the regulation of the value of money, in so doing authorizes the use of those measures which in the judgment of the Congress are deemed necessary and proper. The power to decide what is necessary and proper is conferred upon the Congress, to be exercised in their discretion; and the courts have no jurisdiction to interpose and by construction pronounce it null. It is a legislative power which cannot be interfered with by the judicial power.

Section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, and sub-section 18 thereof, provides that Congress shall have power—

> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof.

The enumerated power or express power in section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution is to coin money and regulate the value thereof.

We have got laws enacted under implied powers where human life is taken. The express power to raise and support armies (sub-section 11 of section 8) is a dead, inert power until it is aided by the implied powers exercised through Congress; and among them is the power, by drafting, to take a man from his family and fields and thrust him into the Army, and compel him to devote his life to the defense of his country. To provide and maintain a Navy is an express power which includes all the implied powers of drafting for soldiers and sailors. The very highest exercise of the sovereign powers in most of the instances that can be referred to under the Constitution are exercised under the implied powers to carry into effect the express powers; as, for instance, those to provide for the execution of the laws of the nation to suppress insurrection and repel invasion. When you come to the implied powers to give that effect you reduce the citizen to a soldier; you take his property, you sacrifice his life; you order him to do certain duties, and if he does not do them you put him to death by a drum-head court-martial. And all under the implied powers of the Constitution.

All this is justified and deemed a matter of course; and while this is so, shall we criticise the powers of Government when it assumes to establish the value of money by making it a tender in payment of public and private debts? Is the property right of the citizen of greater interest and to be guarded by more strict construction than his liberty and his life? If the Congress cannot make money out of paper they cannot make money out of anything. So far as there is any power granted in the Constitution to make anything a legal tender, it is as much granted to make paper such tender as any metallic substance. The meaning of the word "money," at the time this Constitution was framed, was the meaning of it as used in this provision. Was there no paper money then? Did all the world suppose there was no money but gold and silver money? Far from it.

The hard-money men, in the extremity of their case to defeat the adoption of any better method than the one they advocate and to secure perpetuation of the mischiefs of the hard-money currency, have resorted to a denial of the power of their own Government as conferred by the Constitution, and continue to reiterate that the Government has no power to establish a legal tender, in the face of the very plain provision of the Constitution, and after the court of the last resort has deliberately decreed that the Government possesses the power. It was always worth while to suspect a party whose position and argument deny the law of the land as established and construed by the highest authority of Government. Such a party is in a position where he can only win by an amendment of the Constitution.

> The power to make Treasury notes a legal tender, while an incidental one to the issue of legal-tender notes, is, nevertheless, a power not to be resorted to except in extraordinary and pressing occasions; but of the occasion when, and the times and how long it shall be exercised and enforced, it is for the legislative department of the Government to judge.

So says Justice Bradley in the Supreme Court. On more thorough examination it will appear that the Constitution vests in Congress, by express provision, the discretion to determine what legislation or legislative acts are necessary and proper to carry into effect the express powers of the Constitution. These implied powers are to be governed and limited by the discretion of the law-making power alone. That discretion cannot be revised nor affected nor controlled by the decision of the courts. The courts have no jurisdiction to review the acts of Congress that are passed upon their discretion. Congress having, by express provision, the power to regulate the value of money, have the discretionary power to do those things which are deemed by Congress necessary and proper to regulate it. And having acted under this jurisdiction and with that discretion, there is no court that possesses the power to revise their action so far as discretion is concerned.

Can Congress make money without intrinsic value? It is conceded by the Supreme Court decision that greenbacks are money. The paper they are made of has no intrinsic value. And there was no intrinsic value in the iron money of Sparta which was used five hundred years. It was, nevertheless, money; and history teaches us it served a very useful purpose, and its abandonment was a misfortune to Sparta. Its value was quite independent of the intrinsic value of the iron from which it was coined. The masses were too small to be of any intrinsic value to go into any other forms of use. The great philosopher Plato declared it of the utmost importance that money should not have an intrinsic value.

Making paper money a tender in the payment of debts is the most important act in regulating the value of money. It is an act regulating the value of money under the express provision of the Constitution to do so. My colleague, from the late Westchester but now New York district, [Mr. POTTER,] has made the argument of all arguments yet made against the power of Congress to make paper money a tender in the payment of debts; and though he has exercised great ingenuity and learning in arguing the Legal-tender cases before the Supreme Court, and in making, as I think, "the worse appear the better reason," he nevertheless, by the innate logic of his own mind, is drawn into making a concession of the whole question in the language following. I quote from 12 Wallace, page 509:

> And yet, can anything be of greater public importance than to have the value of every transaction measured by a certain, instead of a fluctuating, standard?

Is not this equivalent to saying that nothing can be of greater importance than to have this power exercised and the standard fixed by the supreme authority?

And again, in the same argument, (12 Wallace, page 505,) and more unreservedly and emphatically than before, he concedes the whole question when he says:

> If, by the assertion of the discretion of Congress, it be meant that when the end is legitimate, and within the scope of the Constitution, and a choice of appropriate means exists, Congress is the sole judge of which to select among those means, and that its judgment in such selection is not open to review, I SHALL NOT DENY IT.

Now, no one can doubt that the end is legitimate, for that end was exercising the express power of the Constitution to regulate the value of money. And no one can deny that it is within the scope of the Constitution to regulate the value of money; no one can deny that the Congress is bound to choose the means for regulating the value of money; no one can deny that the Congress is the sole judge, in its discretion, of which of those means to select. It does act; it does according to its judgment; and it is claimed that in this action and selection it is not open to review by the courts. Mr. POTTER says—what does he say?—mark the words—"I SHALL NOT DENY IT."

Let us consider the points involved in the Legal-tender cases, and the decisions of the Supreme Court thereon:

The Legal-tender cases proper involved the power of Congress to make the Treasury notes of the Government a legal tender for pre-existing debts; that is, for debts existing before the passage of the Legal-tender act. (The cases which arose upon contracts specially payable in coin are sometimes spoken of as legal-tender cases, but did not necessarily involve and did not decide that question.)

This question of the constitutionality of the legal-tender act first came before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Hepburn vs. Griswold, in 1868, when the court decided Congress had no power to make the Treasury notes a legal tender for pre-existing debts. The court reheard the same question in the cases of Knox vs. Lee and Parker vs. Davis, in 1870, and, overruling its first decision, then decided Congress had the power to make these notes a legal tender for pre-existing as well as subsequent debts.

Against the law it was contended by the distinguished counsel [Mr. CLARKSON N. POTTER] that the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof was only a power to coin the metals or something with intrinsic value, and fix the true value of coined moneys; that, notwithstanding the erroneous assumption prevalent to the contrary, Congress had never depreciated the currency so as to affect the right of creditors, but had scrupulously guarded against so doing; that the depreciation of the gold coinage in 1834 did not affect the rights of creditors; it was only a readjustment according to their then true value of the actual relations between gold and silver; and since debtors had always had the option of paying in silver, and when the legal value of gold exceeded its actual value had always paid in silver, while gold then disappeared from circulation, such readjustment of the legal valuation of gold to correspond to its actual value in no way affected the rights of creditors, as had been erroneously contended. There had also been some instances of legislation debasing silver coinage, but the debased coin was made a legal tender only for such very limited amounts and special purposes as not to affect the rights of creditors.

It was further contended that the legal-tender power could not be implied as inherent in the national Government, the national Government being not a government of original growth, but one created with limited powers only by the formal act of the people of the States, and was in many respects without absolute sovereign authority; that not only was there no express grant to it of such a power, but that the entire history of the period as well as the debates of the Constitutional Convention indicated that it was not intended that the Federal Government should possess this power, or indeed any power, of making paper to circulate as money; that the power was expressly forbidden to the States, and was only not especially forbidden to the Federal Government because there was no idea by the framers of the Constitution that it was or could be taken to be granted under any provision of the Constitution; that not only was there no express power given to Congress, but that it was not to be implied as a choice of means to carry out any of the express powers. The means necessary and proper to carry out the delegated powers it was insisted must be measures having some actual relation to, some fitness for, the exercise of the delegated power. The issue of legal-tender notes had no such relation, was a mere sale of license to discharge contracts by short measure, which was no more adapted to the power to make war or maintain armies and navies than to any other of the delegated powers. It was insisted that such a construction would be at variance with all the precedents from the foundation of the Government, and also insisted that no advantage really accrued from this provision in the Treasury notes.

The experience of England and this country in its previous issue of Treasury notes, and of the Confederate States, established, as was contended, that such notes, when not legal tender, answered all the substantial purposes that our legal-tender notes answered or could secure. Beyond this it was claimed that such a law was in violation of those rights of individuals which were secured by the Constitution in the clauses providing that private property should not be taken for public use without due compensation, nor without due process of law; and further, that the Federal Government possessed no power to impair the obligation of contracts.

On the side of the Government it was insisted, by Attorney-General Akerman, that the right to make anything a legal tender was a necessary, inherent power in a national government; that this Government possessed all the substantial powers of a sovereign government; that to deprive it of this legal-tender power would be to leave it at the mercy of attacks against it; that Congress was authorized to use any means necessary and proper to carry into exercise the general powers of the Government, such as maintaining armies, navies, and the general welfare, and that Congress therefore was the judge of what means were necessary and proper; but that if their decision could be reviewed in that respect by the court, the court should hold that this legal-tender provision was such a necessary and proper means; and it was not essential that it should have relation to any particular power, provided it was calculated to make the Government more effective and the delegated powers more fully exercised; that it did not impair the obligation of contracts, because whoever contracted to pay dollars, simply contracted only to pay whatever might be lawfully dollars at the time of the recovery upon the contract; and that if this law did impair the obligation of contracts, that was not a restriction to which Congress was subject.

Still further in support of the constitutionality of the legal-tender acts, the Attorney-General said: "Congress has never hesitated to enact what should be a legal tender in payment of debts. The right thus to enact has been assumed in twenty-four statutes, passed in the Presidencies of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Tyler, Polk, Fillmore, Pierce, Lincoln, and Johnson." And these laws have been passed notwithstanding there had been change in the value of coins that were in circulation at the time. Congress at one time said that gold coin of a certain weight and fineness should be worth ten silver dollars, and should be a legal tender for that sum. Congress afterward provided that a coin containing a less quantity of gold should be worth ten silver dollars and a legal tender for that sum.

The power to make this debasement to the extent of 6 per cent. involves the power to carry this debasement to a greater extent. The constitutional power to do these acts has not been questioned by the hard-money men. It is difficult to see the difference between this case and the instance where the nation's paper promise to pay is made a legal tender, though now worth in the market but nine-tenths of its alleged value as compared with gold. It is held that the obligations of contracts may be impaired in metal currency, that the dictates of justice may be disobeyed in metallic currency, that the scope of the discretion of Congress is unlimited within the metallic field; but the spirit of the Constitution is invoked by the bullionist when he hears the rustle of paper money, but is lulled to repose by the clink of metal, however base.

The Constitution nowhere declares that nothing shall be money unless made of metal. Congress has enacted that Treasury notes shall be lawful money; nobody questions here the power to issue them and give them some of the qualities of money, and that power is expressly admitted by the Supreme Court. With certain exceptions they are receivable for all dues to the Government, and payable for all dues from the Government, old and new. The largest creditor in the land, the Government, is bound to take them. The largest debtor in the land, the Government, pays them. The creditors of the United States, except the holders of bonds and interest-bearing notes, must take them or nothing. Nobody pretends that they are not money, in the sense in which that word is used in some places in the Constitution. For instance, "No appropriation of money shall be for a longer term than two years;" "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." Receipts and expenditures of public money shall be made from time to time. That Treasury notes, greenbacks, are money, in the sense in which the word is used in these instances, is admitted on all sides—that greenbacks are money in the sense above used.

The authority of Congress to establish legal tender is found in the express power to regulate the value of money. And this is not embarrassed by the use of the term "coin money" in the same provision. The power extends to everything in general use as money or which may answer the purpose of money; and will embrace Government promises to pay in a form and denominations designed to circulate as currency.

This was the view held in Congress when the act of 1862 was framed, and no doubt suggested the use of the words "shall be lawful money." Perhaps it was in the mind of the Secretary of the Treasury, who then had charge of the national finances and who issued the legal-tender notes, and afterward said to the people of Louisville, Kentucky, in speaking on this subject, "Under these circumstances I coined the credit of the nation."

But a broader base exists for the power in the provision of the Constitution which confers upon Congress a power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof.

The Attorney-General claimed also that increasing the value of the Treasury notes was a process of regulating the value of money. The value of a commodity is increased by the opening of new markets for it. The more uses there are for an article the greater is its value. The notes of a bank which are in demand for many purposes are worth more than the notes of a bank which are in demand for few purposes.

The credit of the United States, as of every other corporation or person, is better when its promises will pay debts than when they will not. Such was the judgment of Congress, from whose judgments on questions of expediency there is no appeal to the judiciary. He quoted the language of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of McCullough vs. The State of Maryland:

> Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all the means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but are consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

The same great authority, in the United States vs. Fisher, said:

> Any means which are in fact conducive to the exercise of a power granted by the Constitution are constitutional. In this case this court may consider the question of congressional power, but not the question of congressional wisdom. The Congress may issue currency as an appropriate means to lawful, constitutional ends; and it may in its discretion give that currency few or many of the faculties of money. In relation to money and contracts, the Constitution exhibits jealousy of the States, but shows no jealousy toward Congress. The law-making power is the main-spring of the Government, and so the Constitution has there wisely reposed power sufficient for the great national exigencies. True the powers conferred are great, and there is possibility of their abuse arising from the imperfection of human character. But the argument against a claimed power on the ground of the possibility of its abuse is an argument against all government.

The court held that in the choice of means to exercise the delegated powers, Congress was at liberty to select this particular power which had proved so beneficial for the maintenance of our Army and Navy, and the welfare of the country; that it did not impair the obligation of contracts, because one contract to pay dollars simply contracted to pay what the Government might declare to be dollars; that if, therefore, the Government had the power to make these notes dollars, the contract remains subject to that powert; that if the means could be considered in any view as necessary and proper for the exercise of the delegated powers, it was not for the court to review the selection of means, but that it remained with Congress to select any means, whether the best or not, that might in any view be regarded as coming within the designation of means necessary and proper. And some of the judges expressed clearly the opinion that such powers were not confined to a state of war; and it may, perhaps, be fairly assumed from the opinion of the court that this power may be exercised at any time, or under any emergency, or in any manner that Congress may approve. This is the necessary result of declaring that Congress is the judge of when and how to exercise this power.

The text of the bill which I have been advocating is as follows:

A bill to provide the money of the United States, and to regulate the value thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the 1st day of July, 1874, each and every national banking association may determine for itself the amount of lawful money of the United States that it will keep on hand; but every national bank and banking association shall, on demand, redeem its circulating notes at par at its own banking house, either in coin of the United States or in United States legal-tender notes.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to prepare for circulation, as standard value United States money, certificates of the denomination of one, two, five, ten, twenty, fifty, one hundred, two hundred, five hundred, one thousand, two thousand, five thousand, and ten thousand dollars, to express on their face, in words and conspicuous figures, the several above-named denominations, with vignettes, letters, numbers, signatures, and such engraved decorations as shall tend to prevent forgeries and imitations, and also express on their face that they are respectively, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, the standard and measure of values to the amount expressed on their face, in all transactions within the United States involving the payment of money, and receivable in payment of all debts, public and private, and shall be a legal tender, at their face value therefor, except the funded debt of the United States, which is by its terms payable in gold, and except as hereinafter provided, and shall be received in deposit at par by all national banks and banking associations. Such certificates shall be put in circulation and applied by the Secretary of the Treasury under, in pursuance of, and in the manner in this act provided.

SEC. 3. That all customs duties due and payable to the United States shall be paid and collected in gold coin and paper currency as follows: From and after the 1st day of July, 1874, to and until the 30th day of June, 1875, both inclusive, said customs duties shall be paid and collected, one-fourth in Treasury notes, or other currency of the United States, or circulating notes of national banks, and three-fourths in gold coin of the United States; from and after the 1st day of July, 1875, to and until the 30th day of June, 1876, both inclusive, said duties shall be paid and collected, one-half in Treasury notes, or other currency issued by the United States, or circulating notes of national banks, and one-half in gold coin of the United States; from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, to and until the 30th day of June, 1877, both inclusive, said customs duties shall be paid and collected, three-fourths in Treasury notes, or other currency issued by the United States, or circulating notes of national banks, and one-fourth in gold coin of the United States; from and after the 1st day of July, 1877, the whole amount of customs duties shall be paid and collected in Treasury notes, or other currency issued by the United States, or circulating notes of national banks.

SEC. 4. That on and after the 1st day of July, 1874, all customs duties, proceeds of taxes, and sales of public lands, interest, and dues from all sources received for account of the United States in Treasury notes and circulating bank-notes, by each and every officer of the United States, shall be transmitted in the identical currency received to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury shall issue and promulgate, to all Federal officers authorized to receive such moneys for account of the United States, rules, regulations, and instructions prescribing, directing, and regulating the time, manner, and means of transmitting such sums of money from the places where they are received to the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, and such rules, regulations, and instructions shall have like obligation and effect as if the same were embodied in this act.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury on receiving for account of the United States, Treasury notes and circulating bank-notes, as provided in the last section, shall cause a memorandum of all such notes to be made and kept in books appropriate for the purpose; and as often as the sum of notes so received shall amount to $1,000,000, he shall cause the same to be destroyed by burning them to ashes, as directed by section 24 of the act to provide a national currency, approved the 3d day of June, 1864. He shall cause a certificate and record of such destruction and burning to be made and entered in the books above mentioned, and a duplicate of so much of said certificate as relates to such portion of the destroyed paper currency as consisted of circulating notes of national banks (or associations) shall be transmitted to the several banks (or associations) the circulating notes of which shall have been destroyed, and then the amount of circulating notes permitted by law to be issued by such banks, respectively, shall be reduced to the extent of the circulating notes so destroyed; and when and as often as the circulating notes of any such bank or association shall have been destroyed, under the provisions of this act, to the amount of $50,000, the Secretary of the Treasury shall adjust the interest account with such bank or association, and release and deliver up an amount of the United States bonds pledged for the redemption of a like amount of the circulating notes of said bank or association.

SEC. 6. That immediately upon the destruction of any sum of Treasury notes and circulating bank-notes, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay into the Treasury of the United States, of and from the United States certificates of standard value authorized and provided under the provisions of this act, an amount equal to the total sum of Treasury notes and circulating national-bank notes so destroyed as aforesaid, and such certificates so paid into the Treasury shall thereupon and hereafter become and be the lawful money of the United States, and as such shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose and in the manner provided by law.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue the said certificates provided in pursuance of this act so that the aggregate amount of the issues thereof, in circulation and in the Treasury of the United States together, shall not at any time exceed the sum of $800,000,000; it being intended by this section to restrict the total volume of such certificates in actual use to within the maximum limit of the sum last above mentioned.

SEC. 8. That when, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, 80 per cent. of the aggregate amount of the circulating notes of the national banks and banking associations shall have been received by the Secretary of the Treasury and destroyed, and an equivalent amount of the bonds of the United States shall have been returned to said banks and banking associations notice shall be given thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury to each of such national banks and banking associations. And thereafter circulating notes of national banks and banking associations shall not be received by the United States in payment of any public dues whatever, and thereafter the interest accruing on the bonds remaining in the possession of the Government as security for the redemption of circulating bank-notes shall not be paid to the banks until the whole amount of the circulating notes of such banks shall have been received and destroyed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 9. That when under the provisions of the last section circulating notes of national banks and banking associations shall be no longer receivable by the United States in payment of public dues, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem such circulating bank-notes at par, at points and places designated by him, by issuing and delivering in exchange therefor equal amounts of the United States certificates of standard value, provided in pursuance of this act, to the parties presenting such circulating notes for redemption, and shall destroy the circulating notes thus redeemed in the manner hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 10. That this act shall take effect immediately.

In former speeches upon this floor I have attempted to show the importance and necessity of establishing in the United States a national circulating medium, issued by the authority of the General Government and based upon its good faith. Since then my attention has been called to an address by Thomas Law, esq., and please not confound him with the John Law who got up the famous "South Sea Bubble," delivered in this city years ago, and as some things he has said so well express the purpose I have in view, I shall, with more or less modification, employ them for that purpose:

This is a subject of such vast importance, by the influence of which just or erroneous opinions respecting it may have on the destinies of our Republic, that few can be submitted which demand more our calm and unbiased deliberation. It yields only in importance to the great subject of deliberation which constituted the labors of the sages in the Convention of 1787, when the Constitution was formed, and perhaps two or three leading events of the war of the rebellion. For it is in vain that, by our political institutions, life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are secured, if, from prejudice or mistaken policy, the means by which alone industry can be called into action and the prosperity of the nation promoted are withheld. In standing forth as an advocate for the adoption of a national currency, and in maintaining its claim to superiority over a circulating medium consisting of the precious metals, or of bank-notes professedly based on them, I am sensible of the prejudice with which I shall be assailed, and of the deep-rooted errors which I shall have to encounter. I enter upon the task which I have assigned myself not with a confidence of fully silencing the clamors which have been raised against a national currency, and of removing all the apprehensions which are entertained respecting it, but happy in the belief to impart that conviction to the minds of some of my auditors which reading and reflection have so strongly impressed on my own. Says Colonel Torrens:

> The hand of man is not armed with any efficient natural instrument, such as the beak of the bird or the claw of the quadruped, for operating directly upon the materials presented to him; but it is admirably adapted for receiving and applying artificial implements, and for employing the powers of one substance to produce the desired change in another. Hence, almost all the grand results in manufacturing industry are brought about by means of capital. Throughout the world there are no striking inequalities in the muscular force by which direct labor is performed; and it is merely owing to the difference of capital, and in the skill with which it is supplied, that in one country a man is found naked and destitute, and that in another all the rude productions of the earth and all the forces of nature are made to contribute to his comfort and to augment his power.

Baron Storch denominates money "the marvelous instrument to which we are indebted for our wealth and civilization." It fulfills a higher purpose than merely forming a convenient measure of value; it creates the desire and means of accumulation, by which industry is stimulated and economy promoted. It has introduced into society also the relation of debtor and creditor, by establishing a price or interest for its use, by which the rich are induced to aid the genius, enterprise, and industry of others, who want the funds to establish their inventions and improvements. Thus the truth is become apparent, that money is not only the effect but the cause of wealth. Hence it is not only essential that money should exist, but that it should also be constantly augmenting in quantity proportionate to the progress of society in population and productions.

The precious metals are insufficient to supply the wants which the accumulating capital and industry of the civilized world require. An attempt has been made by which the circulating medium shall be made to keep pace with the wants of a progressing society by the introduction of paper money. This was circulated generally through banking associations in the commercial states of Europe and in this country; and in the State of Pennsylvania, under Franklin's guidance, banks did the very same thing at a very early period of our history.

It is found that the precious metals cannot serve as a circulating medium to be exclusively relied upon; and that however beneficial banking institutions may have been in many respects, yet as issuers of currency in modern times they have been productive of infinite mischief, partly because it was established on a fluctuating basis. A currency to be good ought to be uniform and national, and to be independent of the precious metals as far as possible.

It is within the knowledge of all those whom I address that, notwithstanding the privations which the country suffered during the war, it never was at any former period in a more flourishing condition. Manufactures were established; lands, lots, and houses were doubled in value; villages sprang up: towns improved; numerous railroad and other companies were organized; and the spirit of enterprise animated every class of the community. The Government, it is true, ought to have relied on its own credit, and to have issued a currency founded on that alone. But as it condescended indirectly to solicit aid from the banks, it is clear to the least reflecting mind that this aid could not have been given unless they had been released from the restrictions of specie payment.

It may be objected that the facility which the national currency will afford to the national Government for indulging in lavish expenditure will induce it to issue national notes to an excess, and thereby cause a depreciation in the value of them. If the three sixty-five plan is adopted, it is claimed that the convertibility of these notes into bonds and the demand for them ceasing will always prove a corrective to this evil. But the merits or demerits of this plan it is not within my province now to discuss. But have we not a further and more complete security against it in the wisdom and integrity of the General Government? We have fearlessly and necessarily confided to it the exercise of powers of equal importance. It is the uncontrollable guardian of the life and liberty of the citizen; to it is intrusted without appeal the determination of the great questions of peace and war, of taxation, and of whatever relates to the main objects for which civil government was instituted. In despotic governments, perhaps, such an apprehension might readily be entertained.

But in the United States the Government and the people are one and the same. In all the transactions of life between man and man mutual confidence is necessary; more particularly is it due to the General Government for the proper exercise of its powers. The responsibility of the Government to the people has always been and will always prove a check to the improper exercise of this as well as of every other power.

Another objection I may notice in passing (and in so doing I fear I shall be charged with insulting the understandings of the distinguished auditory that I am now addressing) is the cry of mere witlings, "Rags, rags!" Was not the Constitution, the charter of our liberties, and are not the laws which have emanated from it, written on paper? Would this charter, would these laws, obtain any additional value by being inscribed on tablets of gold? These same witlings exclaim, "Ready rhino!" and talk of the intrinsic value of gold and silver. Are they not in use inferior in value to iron? The stamp and the value affixed by sovereigns, by a common assent as it were, has given a value to the coins. Will the declaimers against "rags" exchange at par a Government bond bearing 6 per cent. for one bearing 5 per cent.? The intrinsic value of a thousand-dollar bill is no greater than that of a one-dollar bill. But what man considers that fact when receiving either?

My assertion is, that any great nation ought to have its own circulating medium, as every man has his own blood for his body. If we had one hundred millions showered from heaven in specie, it might soon be sent abroad for articles we fancy we want; but the same amount in a home currency would always remain among us, vivifying and producing industry. We have indulged prejudices too long, and use inappropriate terms as if intentionally to delude ignorance. The advocates of the banking interest and the bullionists loudly talk of a sound currency based on gold and silver, which we all own to be articles of commerce. There is, in truth, a jargon which bewilders the senses of many; nay, it would seem we are almost deterred from investigation, and the designation would seem to be accepted by some of a distinguished member of a former Congress, who termed finance a modern Eleusinian mystery. This national currency may form a trio with gold and silver. The superiority of the national paper money will be that fear will not secrete it, avarice will not hoard it, and an enemy cannot withdraw it from the nation.

Should the advocates of a national currency be in error, they will rejoice at its exposure. They solicit investigation and discussion, which elicit light; they desire only the establishment of incontrovertible principles to strengthen our independence, to promote our wealth and happiness, and to cement the Union.

Should gentlemen thoroughly investigate this important subject, they will shudder at the dangers and evils incident to a so-called specie basis—a system which invariably makes the promise to the ear and breaks it to the hope.

On analyzing the grounds of doubt expressed by the hard-money men in their arguments against paper currency, it will be found that such of the arguments as have any weight are really based upon a chronic doubt of the perpetuity of the Government and its good faith. It is worthy of notice that that class of financiers repudiate the idea that our own Government can establish a standard of value or authorize and regulate the value of the currency. Their argument denies to the Government of the United States the possession of one of the highest attributes of sovereignty. They claim that a standard of value for the currency of our country must be such as is established by other governments, foreign and even hostile in feeling, and always hostile in interest, to the Government and people of the United States, and are unwilling that the American people in their monetary system and fiscal affairs shall be made independent of foreign governments and institutions. They justify themselves in taking this extraordinary attitude by the allegation that paper currency without specie basis will not serve the purposes of trade in the United States. This allegation is not founded in fact, and will not bear the test of examination.

The history of the twelve years past in this country refutes it. Our currency has not been redeemable for one hour since the greenbacks were issued, in coin or otherwise, (except that for a short time the Government received them in exchange for bonds;) and yet it has served the people of the United States as a better currency than they ever before possessed. During all this period the greenback has performed the function of money as a measure of value in exactly the same manner as the currency proposed by this bill will perform it under like circumstances. Indeed this bill provides for a uniform, exclusively greenback issue, solely by the Government. And our fractional currency bears even more emphatic testimony to the same effect.

If any one thinks that any party would allow us to go back to the illegitimate and unconstitutional currency we had before the war and exist twelve months, he is greatly mistaken. It would destroy any party. It would be better to continue through all coming time with our present inconvertible paper money, as objectionable as it is in some points, than to resume the situation we were in in 1860 and previous thereto.

It seems to me that the statu quo is better for the people than any scheme proposed other than this bill, with perhaps one exception. Whether it is reasonable to suppose that either of these referred to will pass I am unable to say. If not, I think one would be justified in placing himself in opposition to all other currency bills before the House. If it comes to the worst, and bank-notes shall be made legal-tenders, the greenbacks cannot be spared as legal-tenders. I am utterly opposed to the denationalization of a dollar of our currency; but if the calamity is to happen, that greenbacks are to be withdrawn and their place filled by bank-notes, it must be on the basis of requiring the banks to resume specie payments; for I do not suppose anybody would think of making irredeemable bank-notes a legal tender. If the whole volume of the currency is to be given to the banks and greenbacks withdrawn, the least that ought to be done is to provide that the interest on the United States bonds, pledged by the banks as security for the redemption of the notes, accruing while they are so held, shall not be paid to the banks, but be retained by the Government and paid into the Treasury. I can see no reason why the people should continue to pay interest on the capital used by the banks; and why should not such a proposition in the contingency here indicated be carried by the House?

Indeed, it cannot be denied that the country, in the main, has been doing pretty well under our present system, although just at present it is staggering along in a manner not calculated to excite general admiration. And there is no doubt we do need an improved system of currency.

The Bankers' Magazine, London, opens its leading article in the January number by the admission that the finance of the American Republic has been at once the envy and admiration of the world. The ease with which the huge incubus of debt was encountered, and its attendant liability in the form of annual interest has been liquidated, have fairly astonished all interested in the career of the country. The United States, it is true, are a young and vigorous people, possessing a territory marvelously gifted by nature, practically inexhaustible in its resources, and yielding at every point fresh evidence of considerable latent treasure in mineral as well as various other products. The youngest civilized republic has faced its creditors with unvarying punctuality, and stands before the world fully on a par, for financial power and credit, with the best of Old World countries; sustaining in parallel grooves of action a national increase of wealth and a national repayment of debt. Since 1868 we have reduced our debt some $350,000,000—an amount equaling the value of the income of Great Britain for a single year.

Mr. S. D. Driggs, in a communication in the National Republican, of the 16th instant, remarks that—

> Those who are clamoring for specie payments and deriding our greenbacks, should remember that the country never added so much to its substantial wealth and prosperity as during the past ten years of suspension of specie payment. Paper money, bearing the seal of the Government, should be the only issue. There should be no middle-men, no national banks or State banks, or any banks of issue. There should be but one currency for all, and there should be enough of it to transact the business of the country, to encourage industry, and stimulate labor.

That the greenbacks assisted in carrying the country through a period of struggle, difficulty, and anxiety is a recognized fact.

I have been asked if the fact that gold flows where it is most wanted throughout the world is anything against it as a domestic standard of value? I say, "yes." Perhaps it may be deemed surplusage to add that gold is not intellectual; it does not flow of its own accord, but only as it is acted upon by extraneous influences. I am now speaking of it as the basis of paper currency. It would be easy to show by historical incidents that the position is sound. In Jackson's time United States deposits were removed for political reasons. It was during the hard-money period, the golden era, when the democratic party promised that "gold should flow up the Mississippi," and "golden eagles should shine through the interstices of the silken purses of the common people." Then, as now, the world was full of financiers who travel backwards with their attention fixed exclusively upon the past, who were saturated with the idea that the world was perfect when they were born, and that all changes tend toward destruction. All those people, when the gold, by order of Old Hickory, through the pliable Secretary of the Treasury, Taney, flowed from the East to the West, and the whole financial superstructure built thereon came down with a crash, were astonished.

We ought to conclude, a priori, that if gold when used as money or a basis for money fluctuates in price (changes value) for any cause, it is a poor standard, and consequently a poor basis for a standard of value. If there were enough of it to furnish currency for all the commercial world it would be less objectionable; but even in that case its ponderosity, its liability to wear out, and its intrinsic value for other uses than money, would all prove objectionable characteristics. But when it is considered that there is not enough of it to furnish say 10 to 20 per cent. of the currency required, it is easy to understand that the disturbance of the basis, say 10 per cent., will affect mischievously the 90 per cent. of currency superstructure based thereon. In our circumstances the argument for specie basis is void from absurdity.

Query. Does gold change in value? (I am referring to gold as money.) First. How is the value of money measured? Answer. By the interest that it brings the owner. Secondly. Does the rate of interest which is earned by gold change often? The Bank of England is the vortex of gold movement; ask it, and ask Wall street. The answer must be that it changes from day to day and from week to week. Thirdly. Does it change much or little? The answer must be that it changes more than half, being at some periods as low as 3 per cent., and sometimes higher than 7 per cent. Fourthly. What causes these changes? Answer. All kinds and sorts of contingencies—war, pestilence, famine, conflagration, the potato rot, the army worm, the exhaustion of and the discovery of coal mines, the exhaustion of old and the opening of new gold mines, new discoveries in chemistry, and new developments of mechanical ingenuity, the political measures of governments, and, most of all and worst of all, the financial schemes, plots, and "corners," devised by those individuals who operate and deal in money, and who all (mirabile dictu!) worship the golden calf and clamor for a specie basis; like the bankers, brokers, and silversmiths of Ephesus, they go about shouting, with interested vehemence, "Our craft is in danger!" "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" Gold is god, and the bankers are its prophets!

Would it not be fatuity to adopt as a currency a substance of great intrinsic value, very inconvenient in use, that costs great labor to produce, that is liable to extensive wastage in circulation, thereby annihilating to all intents and purposes a vast amount of actual capital, when we have presented to us a substitute of the cheapest material possible, that can be renewed at little cost, and, if utterly lost and destroyed, does not extinguish an intrinsic value, but its destruction inures really to the benefit of the Government and the lessening of taxation?

Where is the common sense in keeping a vast body of men digging gold to be locked up in vaults? However, we have got to pay off an immense interest in gold, so that the gold-mining interest may doubtless be continued with profit for some time to come. But don't get wild and inflate the currency, for if you do in a short period there won't be gold enough in the country to manufacture wedding-rings.

That veteran editor, J. Watson Webb, who in his palmy days was a great political power in this country, and especially potential as conductor of the New York Courier and Enquirer, in a letter dated Villa Lions, Nice, France, December 31, 1873, and published in the New York Times of February 23, 1874, says—and I desire to adopt its terse statements as expressive of my own opinions—

The late panic will have done no harm nationally, but much good, if you do not permit it to break down our tariff, which I hold is absolutely necessary for our agricultural interest, while it operates only indirectly for the benefit of the manufacturers. Our home market is the only thing that gives prosperity to the farmers, and it is produced by withdrawing millions of our people from the soil to be fed in manufactories. Return those people to the soil, and make them producers instead of consumers, and you make us a nation of paupers. I have no desire to see any competition with the pauper labor of Europe, and hence I have always advocated the very next thing to a prohibitory tariff. Gold has no earthly value save as the medium of exchange between nations. To talk of its intrinsic value is to talk nonsense. It will not make a rail, or a plow, or a scythe, and is utterly useless in the fabric of cooking utensils. Its intrinsic value, if any, consists in its usefulness in the manufacture of rings, ladies' chains, lockets, and other gewgaws; while its actual value and its duties for more than two thousand years have been and are to make up between nations their differences in trade. It is not merchandise, and it is because we have been in the habit of buying and selling it as such, at public auction, that we have recently so severely suffered, and if the debtor nation must always send abroad its gold to pay the balance against it, or substitute a paper indebtedness to be ultimately redeemed in gold, does it not follow that no nation can resume and continue to redeem its currency in gold so long as its imports exceed its exports?

We, thank God, through our tariff, have brought our imports to a point where they are fully paid for by our exports; and if we can, by preserving our tariff, continue to be a creditor instead of a debtor nation, there can be no doubt but gold will be of the same, and very frequently of less, value than paper. No resumption will be necessary. Paper will be in demand, because it is more convenient and less expensive to handle than gold, just as soon as it becomes an established and received fact that paper represents gold. To produce such a result no legislation whatever is necessary, unless it be to increase our tariff on manufactures, which are the products of pauper labor, and against which our free, intelligent, and well-paid labor cannot contend. Do not think to reduce the price of that labor. Give the laborer the wherewith to pay the farmer liberally for his products, and then agriculture, the basis of all national prosperity, will flourish, and, of necessity, the country itself will continue to be prosperous and great. I see you exclaiming, "What does all this mean?" It means that for eight or ten years past the English press, and the paid agents of England connected with our press, have been laboring more zealously than ever to convert our people to free-trade notions. England's existence depends upon our market; a non-intercourse with the United States totally excluding English fabrics would produce such general distress as to render revolution almost inevitable. Her wise men know this, and hence the absurd argument, constantly put forth, that our tariff tends to retard the progress of our country, and this ridiculous argument finds favor with people on our side of the Atlantic; but fortunately, as a rule, these men belong to and constitute a class with one idea only—men who are unwilling or unable to look at any subject in all its bearings, and who have never cultivated the habit of thinking for themselves.

Only yesterday one of the English toadies sent me a London Times containing an article explaining the cause of our late monetary crisis. I knew before reading it I should be told that our tariff was the cause of all the mischief, and that I should find, rehashed up for effect, all the arguments so piteously put forth during the last three years, begging and berating France and the United States not to exclude English manufactures, and thus bring distress upon her toiling millions. And so it was. We are generally told that it is a settled matter, a fact that admits of no doubt, that all our trouble arises from our tariff, and that if we will only resort to free trade and permit England to send us a few hundred millions of her fabrics in addition to what she now sends, all would be well with us. The cool impudence of this advice is something wonderful. Our tariff is gradually working out the results predicted. It is supplying our wants by the labor of our own workshops, the inmates of which are consumers of what the farmer produces, and consequently the farmer gets better prices for his labor, while our imports are decreased, and we become a creditor instead of a debtor nation, and receive from abroad in gold the balance in our favor, instead of sending forth our gold to make up the balance against us. England and her agents never tire in their efforts to seduce us into free trade. Failing in the present and past generations, they are now addressing themselves sedulously to those who are to be our successors. In this work, as in everything else connected with this question, their newspaper published in New York, called the Nation, is the immediate channel through which they address their specious arguments to the rising generation; and I have now lying before me a circular from the Nation addressed to a youth in one of our colleges, and by him forwarded to me, in which their new plan of proceeding is fully disclosed. Is not this fact calculated to arouse our people from their apathy, and to incite in the guardians of the country's prosperity renewed efforts to maintain the great principle of protection to home industry, upon which that prosperity is based?

* * * * * * * *

Look well to your metropolitan press. It gives tone more or less to the press of the country, and if you would return to specie payments, take care that the tariff convictions of the people be not disturbed; keep before them the experience of the past, and the disastrous consequences of the compromise of 1832. To save the Union and put down nullification, Mr. Clay consented to that compromise, and an annual reduction of a certain percentage of the duties imposed by the tariff of 1828, and what were the consequences? We had at the time fifty-eight blast furnaces in operation, and in a few years fifty-seven of them were closed by introduction of English iron, the product of the then pauper labor of Great Britain. Our factories and our workshops were nearly all closed, and their inmates sent back to the soil to become producers instead of consumers of our cereals. Over-production without any home market necessarily followed, and wheat in the West sold at prices which barely paid for the reaping, as the genius of McCormick had not then perfected the reaper. Universal ruin stalked through the land, and the people, with one accord, demanded an immediate return to the great principle of protection to home industry. A generation has passed away since then, and with them, too, many of the lessons taught by sad experience. Let our people be reminded of what was and what has been, and they will close their ears to the siren voice of the charmer, which, now again, would seduce them into the theoretical and imaginary beauties of free trade. Above all, let them clearly understand the advantages of a home over a foreign market, growing out of the fact that the home market abstracts laborers from the soil and makes them consumers instead of producers, and thus lessens production and secures higher prices to the farmers.

One fact in relation to the extent and value of our home market is worth volumes of free-trade theories in regard to a more extended foreign market, at starvation prices, to the American farmers. We have always been large exporters of grain and flour since the war of 1812; and yet up to 1847, the year of famine in Ireland, the five New England States, wherein most of our manufactories and workshops were situated, took annually from our grain-growing States more barrels of flour and more bushels of wheat than in any one year the United States exported to the whole world. Where we had then one thousand we have now more than ten thousand consumers of produce in our workshops and factories; and their millions free trade would send back to the soil to become producers instead of consumers.

What we want is stability in legislation, and such protection to American industry as will make us a creditor instead of a debtor nation, and create and preserve to us our home market. This we now have, and the very natural result is that last year our exports exceeded our imports. Of course, instead of sending our gold abroad to make up a deficiency in exports, we are to be the recipients of gold, in payment of the excess of our exports over our imports. Let this state of things continue, and we require no legislation to enable us to return to specie payments. The difference of trade in our favor will be greater next year than it was the last. That difference has to be made up by retaining among us all the gold we produce, and by receiving a large amount from abroad, and gradually there will be no premium on gold; but, on the contrary, a small premium on paper to make payments between distant parts of the country, and thus the problem of specie payments will be solved by simply letting well enough alone.

But the Treasury wants money, because we foolishly insisted upon a too rapid reduction of our national debt, and too hastily reduced duties on imports. Legislation must remedy this. Let the law which reduced our duties on imports 10 per cent., with no other effect than to put so much money into the pockets of foreign manufacturers, without reducing prices to our people one farthing, be promptly repealed, and let other duties and taxes be restored, until the wants of the Treasury are supplied. This done, let our shipping and ship-building interest be at once cared for. Let every dollar of duties collected on the material used in building a vessel be restored to the builder, and in addition, in order to induce him to use American instead of foreign iron, give him, in the shape of a bounty, the full amount of duties which would have been restored to him if he had constructed his vessel of foreign instead of American iron.

There, I have written you with an aching head more than I have been able to write at any one sitting in three years, and all because of the consummate impudence of the London Times in attributing our late monetary crisis to our tariff, and because I think I discover in the American press and people, through forgetfulness of the past, a yielding to foreign counsels through the seductive voice of free-trade. It is only at such times that I regret my severance from the press, after thirty-five years of labor as the sole and only responsible editor of the Courier and Enquirer. During that long period I was doubtless very frequently in error, but I always believed in what I preached, and it was the conviction of this fact on the part of our readers that made the Courier and Enquirer a prize and its editor a target to be fired at. I have passed my three-score years and ten, and for thirteen years I have been a mere observer of the press and its progress, and yet when I perceive our people called upon to forget the past, and stultify history and experience, I cannot but wish that I was at my old work. I shall, God willing, be home next year, and then, if not too feeble to work, be assured of my readiness to labor con amore in this all-important cause, which more than all others involves the future greatness and prosperity of our country. * * *

The change proposed by this bill will consists in making the entire circulation a circulation of greenbacks. All the currency in use by the Government and by the people will be a uniform issue of greenbacks. And the change will be brought about so prudently and gradually, that the public will be hardly aware that it is going on.

It is a transfer of bank paper money or money issued by private corporations into paper money issued by the Government. It is simply one currency, a uniform currency, to take the place of a currency comprising two classes of paper money and two kinds of metallic money. The new departure consists mainly in the fact that there is no redemption in other property equivalents established, required, or desired. Under the old system we have pretended to have a specie basis, but it has been a sham and delusion. Specie promise was always a sham, a fraud, a lie. This system wears no hypocritical mask. It is what it seems, and seems what it should be. There is no false pretense about it. It comes forward modestly, not with haughty intrusion; but, with confidence in its strength and powers, stands serene and secure, to be seen and known of all, on the high table-lands of truth and honesty, of fraternity and patriotism. Our claim is that a national paper currency of judicious volume, made a legal tender, and receivable at par by the Government in payment of all dues, and on deposit by the banks at its face value, will be worth its face value in gold. If a man can buy commodities and pay his debts with this money, what more can he want? And remember that the President in his message tells us that the receipts of the Government from all sources, during the last fiscal year were $333,738,204—or within about $17,000,000 of the total amount of greenbacks then in circulation. So that the Government practically redeems almost the whole volume of legal-tender every year by receiving it at par. That of itself is a potential factor when we talk about the value of a currency. Then the highest judicial tribunal of the land having rendered its solemn decision that greenbacks are a legal tender for private debts, no matter when contracted, is another great factor of value, and makes greenbacks money.

In our transactions with foreign nations gold is not regarded as a coin, but as a commodity, as bullion. That our gold is stamped at the mint in Philadelphia adds nothing to its value when shipped to England. It is gold, as a raw material simply, that it is rated. The change proposed is substantially to make the entire currency a greenback issue. Why should we choose the dearest substance in the world, and one of great inconvenience of handling, when we can obtain the cheapest substance, and one that can be handled with surpassing facility? Why keep so much labor diverted in digging ore to be worn out in circulation as coin, or to lie idle in vaults as a reserve, when all this labor and waste can be avoided by the use of greenbacks? After a successful experiment of twelve years, had we not better remove the defects of our currency system than to take backward steps toward the barbarism of barter, by attempting the impossible feat of establishing an absolute specie basis for $800,000,000 (after inflation?) of currency, when experts tell us there is scarcely one-seventh of that amount in the country? The way is to go to work and appreciate the currency, and let gold take care of itself. It is as clear as the noonday sun that the Government makes of itself a gold bull in exacting customs duties in gold. It is a great entity, a large operator; and as long as the Government discriminates against its own currency, that currency will be depreciated.

The abolition of a mixed currency—one for the Government customs dues that benefits exclusively the Wall street speculating bullionists; one for the banks of issue, which to them is a subsidy deducted from taxes of some twenty to thirty millions annually, and a national greenback currency, which is the best this country ever had—and the substitution therefor of an exclusively national legal tender, the money of the United States, as proposed by this bill, with the necessary restrictions and regulations as regards its security and volume, would have the effect to bring greenbacks to at least a par with gold. The national legal-tender would be the only currency, and gold would not be sought for. The change of currency would be so prudent and gradual it would only be felt in its beneficial effects, and the continuation of the existing volume of currency would be secured.

Note the opinion of the greatest merchant in the United States, A. T. Stewart, esq., who said on the 30th of December last:

> The present system compels the importing merchant to go to Wall street to buy gold, where he is subject to the disturbing influence of the gold speculators, who, in large measure, control that market. On this subject of collecting the customs duties, I am of opinion that the mistake of collecting them exclusively in gold ought to be corrected, and that payment of a portion thereof should be made in currency, increasing the amount thus payable, from time to time, until the whole shall be payable in currency. I am clearly of opinion that the amount of duties received will be sensibly increased by such a measure. And I am of opinion that the street market price of gold would be sensibly reduced by the same measure, and we should approach nearer to par as between greenbacks and gold.

This is a measure of value, established by authority, good in the hands of every holder for all the purposes for which money is used in the United States, to the value expressed on its face. It may be safely said that it will have a more uniform, a more permanent and steady value than any money we have yet had in use in this country.

I have referred to the fact that the legal-tender or greenback issue of the country is an amount about equal to the amount collected and disbursed by the Government yearly. For it is an absolute fact that, practically, neither gold nor silver is now, and has not been for years, a tender in the payment of debts. It may be assumed that it will never be offered in one single case by one single person in a year, and therefore may be counted out in considering the necessary legal relation of the volume of the legal-tenders to the business of the country.

This bill would set free the total amount of the intrinsic value in the metallic currency in the United States. So far as the precious metals that have high intrinsic value are withdrawn from their natural use where their intrinsic value is available, and used and worn out in the mere purpose of measuring values, (which can be better done by a standard that has no intrinsic value and no other use,) so far as the labor that has produced the gold and coined it has value, it is wasted when it is devoted to the single purpose of providing a measure of value in exchange. It is so much intrinsic value and labor abstracted from the legitimate uses of mankind.

The nations that make the closest adherence to the precious metals as the standard of value in their common business transactions are the nations where civilization has made the least advance; whereas paper credit evidences of value, that are intrinsically worthless, are in the most common and extensive use among people of the most advanced civilization. The change from metallic currency to paper currency in the domain of trade has attended the increase and growth of civilization in every country.

If the system should be adopted under this bill, and come gradually into use, can it be doubted that it would be received with entire acceptance by the whole people, and when once enjoyed would not be parted with? Indeed, I think it would be imitated by all nations of advanced civilization as an improved currency. It leaves international balances to be paid off in bullion, which is a transaction of barter, and which must be submitted to, with its inconveniences, until some possible future time when international laws might be framed which, in this matter, would govern all mankind with the better results that would ensue from a currency separated entirely from intrinsic values.

A sum nearly equal to the whole amount of legal-tender now in circulation is paid to the Government every year by the people, and is repaid to the people by the Government. This fact alone, of the Government receiving at par all its own currency, without the legal-tender feature, would have great influence on its value, and with the legal-tender feature its value would not be questioned.

Did you ever hear a person give a reason why a part of the reserve of the country banks should be kept in New York? It was done as a basis for the provision, which was not passed, that they should redeem their bills there.

The provision of law requiring the country banks to keep a part of its reserve in the city of New York works only mischief. It makes the country bank weak, and subject to the will of the city bank. It drains the country of money where it is needed to move the crops, and helps to produce the disasters of speculation in the great commercial centers about which so much complaint is made. The very same class of financiers—they are all specie-basis men or bullionists—will insist that the reserve should be kept in New York, and that the redemption of the country-bank notes should be made in New York. They always strive to secure that feature and condition to the banking law. The effect of it would be to transfer to the city, where the forced redemption is made, the total amount of money or credit that the bank needs to redeem its bills, and puts the further burden on the country bank of requiring of it to redeem in two places, and therefore have funds in two localities to redeem every single bill that may be offered. The fund to redeem it should be at the place where it is to be redeemed. If the country banks have it redeemed in New York, they must have the credit, and must secure that credit by a ruinous bargain with the city banks. Moreover, if the country-bank circulation is redeemed in the city, it must be returned to the bank, or else the whole circulation would center at the place of redemption. And while it was in the process of being collected and sorted and returned to the bank, it would be so much currency withdrawn from circulation. Every express company and the post-office would be burdened with the bank-notes that passed between the country bank and place of redemption. It is probable that that system of city redemption would have the effect of practically striking down our currency in useful circulation 20 or 25 per cent.

The currency proposed is the currency of the sovereignty and the currency of the people. It puts out of existence that system which has one standard for the Government, and another standard for the laboring man. It is a unification of the currency, and a nationalization and popularization of it.

The popular clamor that there was not currency enough to move the crops is only true in this, that it was not in the hands of those who desire to apply it to that purpose. It is quite possible that the provision of the statute in regard to country banks depositing a portion of their reserve in New York may give an artificial plethora of money and stimulate speculation; but as a general rule greenbacks, while there is no attempt at their redemption, are like particles of water, that travel forever through the volume to which they belong. Just as surely as turning water into the nose of a tea-kettle will raise the water inside, will be the effect of issuing currency in one part of the country upon other portions. Water does not more surely seek its level than does such an improved currency as we have described flow in natural channels. Take out your pocket-book, and the chances are you may find one bill issued at Portland, another at Saint Louis, and another with the signature of Brigham Young.

We hear in debates in Congress of nothing in the nature of currency in circulation but the four hundred millions of greenbacks; but our circulation consists of three or four hundred millions of national-bank notes besides. The bill which I have presented goes upon the basis of retiring both of these currencies, and replacing them by a legal-tender of an amount equal to both.

The way to return to specie payments, that is, to make a paper dollar equivalent in purchasing power to a dollar in gold—a consummation most devoutly to be wished—is to make gold an article that is not sought for. Destroy the market for gold here, which would be done by this bill, and you would very soon find people who would be very willing to change their gold for the circulation of the country. It would be a bill calculated to harmonize conflicting interests in Congress, as I think, provided they would look at it and understand it.

I think the plan herewith proposed could be adopted at this time with perfect success, because the circumstances are auspicious, and perhaps not likely to be repeated. The present grows out of the past, and the future grows out of the present. There is continuity in everything, and there is progress and change in everything. Our present condition of paper currency is such that it might be retired gradually and replaced by the proposed new currency. The new currency would come into use with the two kinds of currency that are to be retired, and on a par with them. As the old currency receded the new would take its place, and its value would be fixed to a demonstration in the minds of all the people before the old should pass away; and we should be left with the new fairly indorsed, with the public mind accustomed to its use, and the public mind established in regard to its utility and value; and many desirable and some necessary results would follow, the first of which would be redemption of the greenbacks at par, for which the faith and honor of the nation are pledged; the second is the separation from banks of all functions of furnishing a circulating medium. Banks would cease to be banks of issue, and become, what they ought always to have been, banks of deposit, of discount, and exchange. They would be deprived of the means, to a large extent, of mischievous tampering with currency by locking up and overissuing. They would necessarily be compelled to base their transactions on the two elements needed in banking—capital and integrity. If such a system were introduced the change would be so complete and so radical that the public would see that nothing more could be done in that direction, and the public mind would settle down into the belief that we had finally obtained a currency of such a character as would enable them to trust the future in business transactions. It would relieve us and the business of the country from the damages and injuries and losses that result from the vicissitudes of other countries. Our currency and our home trade would be comparatively, if not entirely, independent of foreign wars, famines, pestilences, and governmental schemes and speculative contrivances, because all such influences in foreign countries would be based upon a currency about which we would care next to nothing. If our production of commodities of intrinsic value should grow to great volume, if we should become the first instead of the second or third manufacturing community in the world, and much the largest producer of agricultural products, and the largest producers of the precious metals, and the largest owners and controllers of mechanical power, with the most extended and complete system of internal transportation, and continue our habits of thrift and economy, and labor and enterprise, and keep up an improved system of education, the children of the present day would witness the time and the circumstance of America being the center of the greatest production, and the largest amount of exchange of commodities of any country on earth, and the city of New York the center of the monetary system of the world. When that time comes our home transactions would be vastly elaborated, and engross the principal attention of the American people. Our foreign transactions, though they should grow to great volume, would be a minor consideration, and we should have our home currency for the great leading interests, and deal with foreign countries in the (by them) much esteemed precious metals, the possession of which had kept them back while we were prospering under a wiser system. When it should occur that the balance with trading nations should be in our favor they would be compelled to pay us in gold, and then we should be so situated we could take the gold at our own price. The time is in the near future when we shall be imperial in every respect.

In the case of the continental money, there was no sufficient authority to issue it; there was no machinery to enforce the observance of rules that governed it; there was no power to enforce it as legal tender. Lacking the quality of being legal tender, it was simply a commodity for the value of which stipulation had to be made in every transaction. That was under the Articles of Confederation. The old Confederacy as a government, in a certain sense, was a rope of sand. It had not the executive power to enforce its decrees. It may be said it lacked the executive principle. It made laws, but could not enforce them. Every single move to get an army and pay for its support was a matter of great difficulty. The letters of Washington are full of evidences to establish this historical fact. To talk about a paper currency issued by a government that had scarcely any power whatever to enforce any manner of demand, is absurd. Continental money was not issued by a sovereignty. There was no sovereignty, in the proper sense of the word, until the adoption of the Constitution. The circumstances of the country and the Government were as different then from now as possible.

The French assignats are thrust into the argument by the bullionists, apparently in ignorance of their real natnre and the anomalous circumstances under which they were created; as though there was any resemblance between the condition and government of our country now and of France at the time they were issued! In point of fact, there was no sovereignty in France competent to sell and convey title to the property they had covered with assignats. If the power that issued them had acquired authority, the property could and probably would have been sold, and the assignats, that were a lien upon it, might have been good. But the assignats failed to have any value, because the government that issued them failed to have any power. We claim that our coined paper, or standard of value, United States money is good as long as the Government lasts. If you can think of anything that is likely to last any longer, you may substitute it for the credit of our nation. If this paper money will then cease to be valuable, so also will the gold. If our Government was to be so upturned, the gold would all leave it, upon the instinct that there was no power in government to protect property.

It is held by the flexibility men that the system should be so arranged that when currency is in excess, so as not to be profitably invested, it can be returned to the Treasury for three sixty-five bonds. I admit that this looks well on paper; but it is asked when, during the past twelve years, has there been such a plethora of currency that it could not be loaned at 7 per cent. interest? We constantly hear that money is tight and scarce, but no one ever complains that it is too abundant. It is indeed alleged that money is accumulating in the city of New York, but the holders will only loan it on short time. I find that careful financial thinkers deem flexibility, as it is called, (meaning thereby a facility for increasing and reducing the volume of the currency,) as the very worst possible fault which can be attributed to a currency. I await with interest more light upon the subject from its advocates. Meanwhile it seems to me that a permanent quantity, with the mobility which would exist with a strictly paper currency, (all the better if exclusively national and without specie basis,) if a legal tender, would be the desideratum for a home currency. And, in fact, there are in the civilized world no currencies except home currencies. Currency money must always be, always is, legal tender. Currency which is a legal tender will not float away into a country where it is not a legal tender, unless it is of gold or silver so pure that it will serve and pass for the commodity bullion.

Few have fully realized one of the grandest mischiefs that would grow out of what is called a flexible currency. That is this: if the currency were so flexible as to adapt itself to all demands for currency, it would swell to a volume that would be sure to lead to the excessive production of commodities, markets would be glutted, prices would fall off, and bankruptcies would follow. It would, in large measure, defeat the salutary law which we call the law of supply and demand, fixing the price, without which industries and commercial enterprises would very soon run into ruinous conditions. I do not see why it is not logical that, if any degree of flexibility in the volume of currency is desirable, the largest and most perfect flexibility is not more desirable. If this last degree of flexibility should be attained, what is to prevent the currency growing under the stimulus of demand to a degree that would set on foot so many iron manufactories, woolen manufactories, cotton manufactories, &c., as would in a single year produce commodities each in its kind sufficient to supply the wants and needs of the whole world for years to come. And if it did, it would throw upon the manufacturer the necessity of carrying this excessive burden of commodities at great cost while they were deteriorating, and of sacrificing when he stopped his mills the plant and outlay of their creation, throwing out of employment the vast amount of human labor engaged in the enterprises. For when the world has enough, and more than enough, of any commodity, it will cease to buy, and there must be a pause in production. To express it in a different way: redundancy of currency would so enlarge the supply, as compared with the demand, that there would be no capacity to buy and take the quantity on the market, and the price would fall to a degree that would be utterly destructive to the business of any country and all countries.

On the other hand, looking at the three factors that establish price, to wit, demand, supply, and the volume of currency, we have one fixed factor; the demand and supply, having reference to that factor and being adjusted to it, fix a price of commodities, and when the supply becomes in excess the price falls and the production ceases or is diminished; where the demand is in excess, the price rises and stimulates the industry until an equilibrium is established at a compensating reward to the industry that makes the production.

The plan proposed will produce in the very beginning an absolute and reliable test of the confidence in which it is held by the public under the operations of the bill. In the very beginning there would be in circulation three different forms of circulating paper called currency: the Treasury notes or greenbacks, the national-bank notes, and the certificates proposed by this bill. If the certificates encounter this ordeal successfully, the question will be settled and put totally at rest for the future. Yet when that state of things occurs, the certificates are received at their face value in the ordinary transactions of business, in the purchase of property, in the payment of small debts, are received on deposit in banks and in the payment of bank debts, and are received for all public dues at their face value; if this occurs in fact, the problem of their ultimate and complete success will have been demonstrated.

It is true that currency of doubtful value begets careless and uneconomical expenditure. The greenbacks and the bank-note currency, if they have produced speculation or imprudence, it is not because anybody has doubted their being good, but probably because at times there has been too large a volume in circulation. With gold for a basis it is not in the power of the United States Government, nor within the reach of human wisdom anywhere, to fix the volume of such a circulation. It ebbs and flows with extraordinary vicissitudes.

Is it yet proved that it is desirable that the currency have the quality which is called "elasticity?" Would it not be worth while to inquire whether the safety of the country does not require that it should not have it? It is for Congress not only to provide the lawful authority to pay out the currency, but the currency itself to pay out. The Government must turn banker to that extent. Would not elasticity be disastrous? Stability of standard and stability of price is the great safety for labor, for manufactures, for merchants, for bankers, for capitalists.

The first essential is a fixed and unchangeable volume to the currency. We ought to be justified in assuming that Congress will take care that that great essential element—the very life-blood of public prosperity—shall not be tampered with. In this connection it is proper to say that it is unsafe, contrary to the theory of government, and fatally objectionable to permit any other authority than the Government to issue anything in the nature of currency on their own volition. Private individuals cannot be trusted with that power. An aggregation of individuals in a banking or other corporation are even less to be trusted. In both cases they will act generally from an interested and special motive, regardless of the public effect of their action. These guards being thrown around the law, we shall no longer hear it alleged that there is a ring of bank presidents and bank officers and bank attorneys combined, and armed with the sinews of legislative war thronging the lobbies of the Capitol to produce an effect upon the body of the currency, when that currency shall be unified and be in effect the currency of the sovereignty of the people. The special interests of these great corporations that make money out of fluctuations in currency will cease when the system established by this bill shall have taken full effect. We shall find no organization anywhere in the United States sending their delegates here or elsewhere to produce public opinion and induce legislative action for the inflation or the contraction of the currency. This is one of the most objectionable features of our present compound currency. It should be eliminated, eradicated, cut up root and branch.

And I am credibly informed that at this moment, there is a very "swarmerie" of those people from our principal cities in the lobby and surrounding the Capitol. As was said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUNDY] on the 24th of this month:

Such men can come here and appear before our committees. But do you see here delegates from the mines or from the farms of the West? Are there here any representatives of those who dig in the soil or work under ground? O, no; they have no money; they cannot come. Are there deputations here from the one hundred and ten thousand men who are out of employment in the city of New York? Here and at the other end of the Capitol you will see fat, sleek gentlemen telling us what we ought to do about this question of banking and currency. Do you see any deputations here from the far West, where their corn is burned as fuel because it will not bear the cost of transportation to the sea-board? No, sir; for they have not the money to spare upon which to come, and they have no railroad passes. They are not here in force or out of force. Mr. Speaker.

The money goes to the center of largest production. The money of the world flows there by inevitable laws in perpetuity. Under this system the money of the United States will run as surely and instantly where it is most wanted, and where there is most to be made on it, as water runs to find its level.

The Philadelphia Inquirer of the 26th instant contains a letter of Hon. Isaac Buchanan to Henry C. Baird, which it thus introduces:

We beg to call the attention of our readers to the following forcible and able letter of this distinguished gentleman upon the subject of our finances.

Mr. Buchanan is a veteran thinker and writer upon money, having devoted nearly forty years to its study and elucidation. In his well-known and oft-repeated doctrine, that money should be of a people, of a State, and not of the world, he has formulated one of the soundest and most thoroughly fundamental doctrines in regard to finance ever given to mankind, and it alone furnishes an unanswerable argument against bullionism in all its forms and phases.

Mr. Buchanan is a leading merchant in Hamilton, Ontario, approaching four-score years of age, and has filled many important positions connected with the provincial government, among others that of member of its Parliament and cabinet officer. He says:

"It seems full time, then, to ask the pressing question, 'Who will bell the cat?' by announcing in Congress the 'never more' of specie payments, and that, even though gold were temporarily to fall in price to par, or under it, the greenback must still remain the legal-tender 'money' of America. Let Congress authoritatively decide this, and the country is safe; but let it refuse, and the state of monetary paralysis will continue, and the result no man can tell. Enlightened patriotism, and even humanity, shrink from the anticipation. The simple question is between the repudiating of gold, or the repudiating of payment by America, with all its disgrace and calamities. The repudiation of gold is, therefore, due to common honesty as well as to humanity. It is as certain that the war debt cannot be paid under a gold system as that under it the Union could not have been preserved. A gold system anywhere would not last a day, as being the death of industry, except for the ignorance of the people, and is only possible in ordinary circumstances; but no ignorance could make it possible in the extraordinary position of America."

In order to the development of industry and enterprise a country should possess a pretty large fund of floating money that can be at once applied to help the merchant or the manufacturer.

It is true that with any volume of currency that you can mention there will be plenty of individuals who have none, or too little. It is beyond the power of human invention to devise legislation which shall put money in every man's pocket. When you shall have by law filled the purses of all the people with money, you will have repealed the ancient beneficent ordinance, sometimes called curse, that by the sweat of his brow every man shall eat bread, and have taken away all the stimulus and main incentives to enterprise, industry, and frugality. Fix your currency so that any man who earns any shall have it of good quality. It is in vain by congressional legislation to provide one section with larger amounts of currency than another. They have it not now, because their industrial interests and conditions are such as not to entitle them to it. You cannot well place currency by law. It will flow to the pockets and quarters of those who own it. You give one section arbitrarily an increased percentage and it will immediately float off to other sections where the industry and enterprise of the people are such as to entitle them to have it.

Are not our prices adjusted to the volume of our currency irrespective of the price of gold? The price of gold on Wall street is not responded to except so far as gold is a factor in the cost. Imported articles are affected directly in proportion to the extent that gold is a factor in the cost; but in the main domestic productions are adjusted to the volume of our currency. A change of price in gold of 10 per cent. in Wall street will have very little effect on domestic articles; on imported articles it will have a direct and immediate effect. Gold fluctuates as well as paper currency.

The state of prices depends on three things. It is the relation between commodities that are sought to be sold and the demand for those commodities and the volume of the currency. The number of persons who want an article and the number of persons who have the article to part with, with the further factor of the currency that is to buy it—with these you have all the elements that affect price; you do not have them without. No matter what the amount of the currency, if there is a great deal of wheat and nobody wants to buy it, you have no price.

Why should we adopt the dearest material, which is heavy and inconvenient, for a circulating medium, when we have offered to us one that is cheap, light, and combining every characteristic of convenience in use?

There is no objection to free banks if they are banks of discount and deposit; but it will never do to have free banking and leave to the volition of the citizen the issuing of the currency of the country. Power and responsibility must always be united. If the banks are not responsible to the public for a sound and uniform currency throughout the United States, they ought not to have the power to do anything in relation to it. Power and responsibility must go together in all public affairs. There is no safe ground but to deny to all private corporations the power of issuing money. The sovereignty of the nation ought to be the sole fountain of issue. The enlightened self-interest of every citizen is bound up with, and must be subserved by, the establishment of this principle.

The experience of all the people, even the bullionists themselves, is, that paper is the preferable currency, the most desirable and safest, and the freest from the mischiefs that attend other circulation. Nobody expects that prudence will entirely guide the action of individuals in trade. Each commercial man, each citizen acting on his own view of his own interest, will enter upon enterprises and pursue them with the sole view of his own benefit, and mainly with the interest of benefiting himself at the expense of those with whom he deals. The Government, on the contrary, in its action in establishing a currency, cannot very well have any mercenary motive to misguide its judgment. And if there is capacity anywhere to judge soundly in respect to the national currency and its fitness for the uses for which currency is desired, it ought to be found in the government which alone has the power to establish and regulate it. And if it is not found there it can by no possibility be found elsewhere.

Sir Robert Peel, when introducing the bank act of 1844, stated that some had contended—and he was not prepared to deny the proposition—that, if we had a new state of society to deal with, the wisest plan would be to claim for the state the exclusive privilege of the issue of promissory notes.

Robert Lowe, in a letter published in the London Times, December 20, 1872, (and if I mistake not he was then chancellor of the exchequer,) says that it is generally recognized "that the issue of notes is the creation of money, and that the creation of money is the business of the state, not of any trading association; hence it follows that the issue of such notes by private bankers is rather an anomaly which we may tolerate than a right which we ought to extend." The idea of giving a few men a corporate capacity to issue, regulate, and control the medium of commerce among a great trading people, seems rather to evince the inattention than the skill of those who established it.

We hear some talk as though the opinion were held that a system of finance should be adopted that would take care of the dead ducks in Wall street in times of panic. But it seems to me that in framing legislation this should not be considered; for, in the language of a recent issue of the London Times, "no man is justified in venturing into deep waters with all his canvas set, as if fine weather were bound to last forever, and then crying out, when the gust strikes him, that there should always be a government ship of the line within hail to save him from the consequences of his own imprudence."

The principal fault, the fundamental difficulty, about a currency consisting of the precious metals, grows out of the fact that they are precious and have intrinsic value, and are marketable commodities that rise and fall independent of the fact that they possess the quality of money. It is a safe proposition in logic to say that no commodity that has itself intrinsic value in the market of the world can be used as a complete and safe standard of values of other commodities. As a question of economy, it is not the best thing to choose, as it is the dearest and most cumbersome article to apply to a use where it can produce nothing in the way of benefit to the holder of it.

So far as the material of which money is made has intrinsic value, so far it wastes the labor necessary to acquire it. The actual intrinsic value of gold as a commodity is one thing, and its conventional value growing out of its use as coin and bullion and a legal tender in payment of debts is another thing. There is no history of the price of gold measured by its intrinsic value; because gold has been used as a medium of exchange. People, when they begin to think of it, see that the main elements that make gold desirable are conventional, growing out of the habits and laws and consent of trading nations. And it is not sound to assume that it is necessarily and unchangeably valuable to that degree. There may be better methods which, if adopted, would leave gold to enjoy its rated price growing out of intrinsic values for other purposes than use as bullion in exchanges or money in the payment of debts. Nevertheless it is to be conceded that for the present, and until catholic and comprehensive measures are taken by trading nations to provide a medium for the payment of balances between nations and independent jurisdictions, this quality may be an advantage; but within any sovereign jurisdiction, where the government always fixes, and must fix, and nobody else can fix, the tender in payment of debts—which is the actual standard for that country—the quality is in no respect essential. And its intrinsic value is an embarrassment instead of a benefit. For, because of its intrinsic value and for many other reasons, it is constantly liable to be drawn away from one sovereign jurisdiction to another; and by that amount affects injuriously, and sometimes fatally, the prices of commodities and the scale of obligations between debtor and creditor. That is to say, if the currency of the United States were based wholly upon gold, and prices fixed commensurate with the prices of that commodity, and suddenly, by the operation of causes in another country and another sovereignty, one-half of the gold basis of the United States were removed, there must necessarily be such a fall in prices and such a change in the scale between debtor and creditor as would be fatal to the debtor class—such a shrinkage of values as would be fatal to all commodities seeking a market.

Now, then, if the currency upon which our prices were based were a domestic currency, depending upon the sovereign authority of the country, and without intrinsic value, by no cause operating in a foreign country could that currency be withdrawn or reduced in volume; and therefore the quality which is supposed to be objectionable and fatal by the advocates of a gold basis would prove to be an entire protection against the most dangerous feature of financial affairs.

And, in closing, I beg leave to introduce a few excerpts with some cogitations of my own, to which I desire to call the attention of the House, (and I have endeavored to give credit where practicable:)

When notes which are not convertible into coin are notwithstanding legal tender, then it is plain that their value cannot be in anywise dependent on the value of coins. Such notes are not representatives of money, but are themselves a variety of money. They circulate because their issuers have power to make them legal tender, and because money of one kind or other is indispensable. Notes of this description have little or no intrinsic worth, so that their marketable or exchangeable value depends entirely on the extent to which they are issued, compared with the business they have to perform. If their supply be sufficiently restricted, their value may be maintained on a level with that of gold, or even raised above it. In their case everything depends on the discretion of the issuers.

Paper money, (meaning thereby notes not payable on demand, but which are, notwithstanding, legal tender), is not affected by a want of credit. It may be depreciated through excess, but by nothing else. It has no intrinsic worth, and is not the representative of anything in particular. Its value, as already shown, is entirely dependent on the extent to which it is issued. From 1797 down to 1821, Bank of England notes, though not payable in gold, were de facto legal tender, and their value was determined by the principle now stated, and by it only.—Encyclopædia Britannica.

The special risks attending the use of paper have been shown in practice to be so capable of remedy by legislative precautions, that at present, in Scotland, one-pound notes are taken with less suspicion than sovereigns.—Chambers's Encyclopædia.

Money, of whatever it is composed, whether of metal or paper, like every other commodity, depends for its value on the proportion between it and the commodities for which it is exchanged; if this proportion is altered, or deranged, the value of the money will be altered.—Rees's Cyclopædia.

The fact that the declaration that paper money comes from an authority through whose hands a great portion of the money of the country must pass cannot fail to give credit and circulation to such money, and its value will be regulated by its volume.

Paper money, passing from hand to hand, represents transactions, and is virtually redeemed at its face value every time it is received by the Government in payment of taxes. And much the larger part of our entire money, including national-bank notes, is thus redeemed every two years. I hold that the wealth and productiveness of this nation are so great as to render all transactions safe in any paper, of not excessive volume, authorized by and within the control of the Government. Can it be doubted that a great nation like the United States can give circulation to money independently of its intrinsic value, by receiving it in payment of the demands of the Government? Add to this that the courts stand behind the debtor to protect him in offering it as a tender in satisfaction of private debts. Nothing is clearer to my mind than that ready and general acceptance will be given it without any provision for metallic redemption.

With the currency proposed by this bill, variations of prices will depend on the amounts of production, and the demand therefor. A variation in the power or value of such money must proceed from a change in the supply of commodities.

When commodities are sold the seller cares nothing for the intrinsic value of what he receives in payment; he only wants to feel assured that the money he has received will be taken from him at an undiminished value.

The value of the paper money of a great and imperial nation like our own, assuming that it is a legal tender and receivable for public dues, depends mainly on the volume issued and the confidence of the people in the perpetuity and good faith of the government. With these conditions favorable, the establishment of a national currency must work immense benefits to the country at large. To keep gold locked up in the Treasury vaults for the redemption of such money would be worse than useless; it would be, so long as the precious metal remained in this situation, simply a waste of treasure, a deadlock, producing nothing, and might as well lie idle ore in the mines of California.

Says Ricardo:

Besides the other advantages attending the use of paper money, by the judicious management of the quantity, a degree of uniformity which is by no other means attainable is secured to the value of the circulating medium in which all payments are made. The introduction of the precious metals for the purposes of money may with truth be considered as one of the most important steps toward the improvement of commerce and the arts of civilized life; but it is no less true that, with the advancement of knowledge and science, we discover that it would be another improvement to banish them again from the employment to which during a less enlightened period they had been so advantageously applied.

The advantages are obvious of providing the very cheap medium, paper, instead of the very valuable medium, gold; thereby enabling the country to derive all the profit which may be obtained by the productive employment of a capital to that amount.

That a thing of intrinsic, and therefore necessarily of varying, value, is unfit for a standard of value would seem an axiom; for, as Lord Lauderdale, in his work on Public Wealth, observes:

As nothing can be a real measure of length and quantity which is subject to variations in its own dimensions, so nothing can be a real measure of the value of other commodities which is constantly varying in its own value.

Gold and silver are articles of merchandise for which a valuable consideration must be given before they can be obtained. The employing of an article of no intrinsic value in place of those expensive articles, would be advantageous; and especially paper answers every purpose of currency better than gold and silver, and is therefore invaluable. If not used as coin, gold and silver may be made into articles of taste, use, and luxury, and their value saved and utilized.

Why should objection be made to a cheap medium of circulation in place of an expensive one? Gold and silver make a very expensive currency. A uniform national legal-tender paper currency, entirely free of a metallic basis, is the cheapest and best that can be provided. As Thornton observed, in his famous paper in the Edinburgh Review on the paper credit of Great Britain, "to employ paper money instead of gold is to substitute a very cheap instrument of commerce in the room of a very expensive one." In other words, by the use of paper money, which is of no intrinsic value and difficult to counterfeit, a cheap medium is substituted for a very expensive one; for when gold and silver are made into coins and put into circulation, their value is lost to the country, but when their place is supplied by a paper currency they are restored to their natural situation as part of the active capital of the country.

And Ricardo says:

Besides the other advantages attending the use of paper money, by the judicious management of the quantity, a degree of uniformity which is by no other means attainable, is secured to the value of the circulating medium in which all payments are made.

And it has been contended with great force that a currency to be perfect should be absolutely invariable in value.

Paper money has the desirable quality of being invariable. Do not our greenbacks pass freely at the value for which they are issued? Do not $100 in greenbacks pay off $100 of debt at any time in any part of the country? And if a man can pay his debts with his money what more can he ask of it? Paper money has the desirable quality of being economical. Its manufacture is not expensive, and its wear and tear is scarcely an appreciable factor in cost. Paper money has the desirable quality of being convenient in use. Are not greenbacks easily handled and counted, and transferred with great facility from place to place?

The dollar is the money unit of the United States. The Government having established a measure of value founded upon this ideal unit, or money of account and contract, the money unit or its integral parts or multiples, being exhibited on the currency, facilitates enumeration, exchanges, and payments, and contributes essentially to the convenience and advantage of the public.

Above all things remember that the value of inconvertible paper is to be sustained by the discretion of its issuers.

And now let us squarely admit the danger attending the issue of paper money, in order that by being forewarned we may be forearmed. In the long run it will be found that the greatest enemies of paper money, and the best friends of the bullionists, are those legislators who favor an undue expansion of the currency. The weak point in paper money is the weakness of legislators. But all human legislation is involved in this criticism. If legislators are not wise and firm enough to establish the security of paper money, by keeping the volume within judicious limits, the country will soon be all at sea, values unsettled, and the basis upon which business operations are conducted will be undermined, and the hard-money men will in the end come in triumphant, and in grim glory sit enthroned amid scenes of ruin and distress. It is the right thing to have paper money, but it must be provided in the right way.

The principal distinction between commercial paper and money is that paper money will pay debts at the face rates on the ground that it is lawful tender; while the other paper, if it is transferred at all, has to be the subject of special bargain in each particular case.

The more advanced a nation becomes, the more its credit takes the place of capital.

Money, as a circulating medium, is mainly useful for the purpose of measuring values.

The continental money rested on the credit of a people without money and without the means of getting it, and with a government powerless to execute its decrees.

This system is applicable to all nations whose governments preserve public credit. It is a universal panacea for the specie-based banking malady, so destructive to the productive part of the community. It is not making a case for a disorder, but it is a sanative, a vis vitæ.

Our Wall street financiers, wise in their own conceit, who appear to believe that when they die all wisdom will die with them, in advocating a specie basis, would induce our national Hercules to fancy that he must walk upon crutches. They would make him imagine that he cannot use his legs, and that he must go crawling about, leaning on their shoulders. On the other side, we would teach him to throw away his crutches and walk alone. Need I say more? Verbum sat sapienti.

The country's distress is mainly occasioned by the ignorance or neglect of finance. Jefferson's words, written from Monticello June 25, 1825, are as applicable to-day as then:

> Your situation is painful, but neither novel nor unfrequent. It is, indeed, that of a great portion of our countrymen; brought on them not by their own errors, but by that of our legislators, in subjecting the proportions between the money of the country and its other property to the gambling operations of money-brokers.

President Madison long ago said to Congress in a message:

> It may become necessary to ascertain the terms upon which the notes of the Government (no longer necessary as an instrument of credit) shall be issued upon motives of general policy as a common medium of circulation.

We can adopt the system here proposed and secure perpetual strength and prosperity to our nation, or we can go on and place the great power of issuing money in the hands of selfish private corporations, and which all thinking minds must foresee will invest our future with clouds of calamity portending general ruin and distress.

The desideratum attained by this plan is the utilizing and putting in operation the moneyed capacity of the nation.

This currency is established on the broad basis of the national faith, issued in convenient sums for ready exchange, receivable by the United States for all dues, made a legal tender in the payment of debts; it cannot be doubted that such paper, gradually displacing all other, will be received even more readily, and will as certainly become a medium of circulation as any promissory notes ever put forth in this country.

There will be made no difficulty in receiving a Government paper in which the people can pay their debts and taxes, is received at banks on deposit, and by which they can accomplish their accustomed purchases.

It is a fact, as notorious as deplorable, that the former currency, especially of a great portion of the western country, and known by such names as "wild-cat," "red-dog," &c., was of that feeble, unsubstantial character that it lost its power of performing its functions, if by any accident it wandered beyond the narrow confines within which it was forced into being and maintained its sickly existence. It was, in fact, scarcely more than a nominis umbra even within its own particular circuit of motion. Indeed, such a currency, as is proposed by this bill, the soundness of which shall be pledged by the national faith, will be cordially welcomed by all classes of the community.

The plan promises extensive benefits to the country at large without encroaching upon the rights, or curtailing the peculiar advantages, of any portion of it, to ameliorate and improve the condition of all the great classes of the community without sacrificing or diminishing the particular interests of any—promises, in short, to augment the resources of the nation, without subtracting from those of a single individual except the gold-gamblers. Far be from me any disposition but that of thankfulness for the opportunity thus afforded me to answer objections, and thereby to render my plan more perspicuous. If convinced of any defects I will cheerfully correct them, having laid it down as a rule through life to acknowledge error, thereby proving myself wiser to-day than I was yesterday. If members shall, upon consideration of this system, find that it oughtto be approved, it will be satisfactory to know that they will have the liberality to avow it, and the political zeal and fortitude to promote that which may benefit the nation.

This plan, humbly suggested, may cause an experiment productive of unforeseen, permanent, beneficial consequences extending to all the community. I trust persons considering this plan will reject all prejudices, and maturely deliberate upon a mode whereby it is believed objects so much desired by all sensible well-wishers to our country may be readily obtained, and without which, I seriously fear, they will be long postponed. What millions have been lost to countries by the imbecility of their financiers, who depreciated the credit of the nation, by giving a preference to the credit of associations of a few individuals, who had no credit and no resources but those they derived from the governments of those countries! An interesting and very useful chapter might be written on this subject.

In my humble judgment no other plan ever proposed will so unfold to our fellow-citizens their vast resources and to the world the efforts of enlightened republicans, surpassing all that sovereigns ever have performed.

The Edinburgh Review, as long ago as 1818, admitted that there was perfect security that the power of issuing paper money would not be abused; that is, "if there was perfect security for its being issued in such quantities as to preserve its value relatively to the mass of circulating commodities nearly uniform, the precious metals might be entirely discarded from circulation."

Having presented my plan and having assigned my motives therefor, here perhaps I ought to stop; but men accustomed to exclaim against what they term rags may perhaps compare the standard money of the United States to assignats and continental money. I therefore say to them, as Thomas Law said to his opponents, the assignats and continental money were issued during a revolution, when the issuing insurgents had no quid pro quo to offer. But this money of the United States will be desired, and will not need to be forced. The plan herewith submitted to superior judgments is a very simple and feasible one, and designed and calculated to accomplish purposes of the utmost importance. It is a piece of financial mechanism which will proceed without obstructing any of the operating wheels of Government, and will accomplish the aggrandizement of our country by a new power, as it were, and will provide ways and means to bring industries into activity and materials into use. If any defect can be found in the plan which has escaped my scrutiny, I shall approve of its rejection; but if no serious objection can be found, I hope that wisdom, philanthropy, and patriotism will unite to improve our present financial system; for what is proposed cannot be called altogether an experiment after our twelve years' experience, as I have suggested, without being deterred by the consideration of its being partly a novelty. Newton's planetary system, Hervey's circulation of the blood, and many other established truths, were once deemed theoretical, and even violently opposed.

With money issued by national banks the profits go into the purses of individuals; with money issued by the United States, the profits inure to the public, and pro tanto reduce taxation.

National credit includes the credit of every individual in the nation, and it will arouse his bravery, interest, and patriotism like other property. This open fairness will be appreciated and extolled by the people, and it will be in vain for the advocates of specie-promising banks—and who never could pay gold when it was most wanted—to oppose this principle as an interloper and innovater; for the Government notes will be in high credit, and will circulate with alacrity.

Let it be our glory to surmount the obstacles of nature, by joining our inland seas with the ocean, to cause our wildernesses to flourish with civilization, to make our citizens one people in common interest and common affection, and cause all the States to be united by the cement which is to be found in the moral principles given to the whole human race by our all-powerful, all-wise, all-just, all-beneficent Creator.

To further employ Thomas Law's language: "The question forces itself upon every well-wisher for his country's happiness and prosperity, have we not at least as good a credit as any other nation? We have a larger population than Great Britain, and have more productive laborers; we have millions of acres of land that can be had for a song; we have gold, silver, copper, iron, lead, and other minerals, with immense coal and petroleum resources; a fertile soil, and varieties of climate for numerous products. More than all, we have an intelligent, enterprising, industrious, and energetic population. Why, then, are we compelled to borrow, and run in debt to foreigners?"

Is it not because we need improvement in our financial system? The truth is, that the acute minds of Wall street, the gold speculators, and the banking interest, have had too much to do with dictating financial legislation. Is it not high time that the people were aroused to know the fact that they are selling their birthright for a mess of pottage in allowing the monopolists to run legislation? Above all things provide that the volume of the currency be not excessive; and consider carefully the following from the Encyclopædia Britannica:

> The demand for money is not like the demand for other things. A man may have enough of beef, of beer, of cloth, and of a great many other articles: but of money he never can have what he would consider enough. An increase of money means an increase of riches; that is, of power and consideration, and the desire for these is altogether illimitable. Whether money consists of paper or gold, or both, the demand for it will be alike great; and will wholly depend on the price or interest charged for loans, and not on the value of the money lent. It is plainly the merest driveling to talk about the demand for money being limited by the wants of the public. These wants, like the avarice of the miser or the thirst of the dropsical patient, are altogether boundless. They have no possible limit, and would be as great after one hundred or one thousand millions of notes or sovereigns had been issued, as after an issue of ten or twenty millions.

The great thing to be guarded against is excess of volume.

The effect of inflation is put with great force and clearness in a leader in the New York Sun, as follows:

> Many of the southern and western Senators are crying out that their States are poor and destitute, and that they must have more money. Their sincerity and truth are not to be doubted. It is only their intelligence that is to be impugned when they express their judgment that a new issue of greenbacks or bank-notes would supply this want. They do not see that their actual need is more movable capital, more available property. But this they cannot have till they earn it, or until they import emigrants who have it. If the Government had the authority to issue and should issue five hundred millions of greenbacks to-morrow, not a dollar would go to those States simply by virtue of the emission. No part of it could be obtained except by exchanging products or other values for it; and if anybody in any of those States has got the money's worth, he can exchange it for the money itself, already, without waiting a day for new issues of paper. If we are assured that the money could be more easily obtained if the volume in use were artificially doubled, the reply is that this might be so for a brief period at the beginning, but that the fact amounts to nothing, since in doubling the amount the purchasing power of the whole would be reduced one-half, so that at the end of the operation things would stand just where they were at the beginning. The argument for a purely artificial inflation of the currency at a juncture like the present, without a single public necessity urging it, is so preposterous that it cannot stand the test of intelligent exposition.

And an eminent writer has said:

> To throw off these metallic fetters from our commercial industry is but to prove they are no longer necessary. It is to vindicate the power of reason over prejudice, of practice over theory. As it regards our trade it is virtually to give every species of property a locomotive power from its creation to its consumption; by which the means of existence are dispensed to a wider circle, and employment given to the industry and talent of all. By these means is the frame of society strengthened and improved, mutual confidence increased, and mutual dependence rendered indispensable; the very bond of public faith and national security; the very object of our temporal existence; the very elements of human happiness.

Huskisson says:

The quality of representing commodities does not necessarily imply intrinsic value; because that quality may be given either by confidence or authority. The quality of being a common measure does not necessarily imply intrinsic value any more than the possession of a foot-rule implies the power of acquiring whatever it enables us to measure.

Perhaps my repetition of arguments may remind one of the old couplet:

By repetition, truth, at length, we own,
As drops of water penetrate the stone.

If driven to the necessity of deciding between the alternative of suffering the present state of things to continue, or of restoring the old system, or give the banks additional power of issue, I should not hesitate to prefer the former.

In reference to the three sixty-five bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] I may say, at the outset, that I have not given it a complete analysis, and will admit that it bears examination better than I expected. Indeed, I feel very kindly toward the bill, and rather desire to support it than otherwise, but await more light in order to do so in a manner which shall be satisfactory. One cannot quite foresee what precise effect it might produce, because it cannot be assumed that the bonds would not be purchased to a material extent; therefore all speculation must be predicated on an if. While sundry theoretical objections may be urged to the system, one can have no great faith in them by reason of the aforesaid if. I will venture to state some of these objections hap-hazard:

1. They would form a third class of bills of credit, when two are too many. We wish for a unification and simplification of the currency. But it may be denied that these bonds can properly be considered currency. If so considered and this bill passes, our currency would consist of bonds, United States notes, gold and silver, nickel and copper coins.

2. If the bonds are taken, they would enter into circulation for payment of debts, purchase of property, and as a medium of exchanges in sums above fifty dollars. The process of putting them out and buying United States bonds with their proceeds would not diminish the volume of currency; but, in a measure, and perhaps in full measure, the amount issued would be added to the volume of paper currency. I am opposed to inflation until the currency is appreciated to gold. If they should occupy the channels of circulation in transactions where United States notes of the denominations of $50, $100, $500, and $1,000 are used, (and I can see no reason why they will not,) it would be a possible process of inflation, to which there would be no limit short of United States gold-bearing bonds.

3. If they should be issued and redeemed, and others issued in their stead—that is to say, converted and reconverted to a large extent—it would subject the public to the evils attending a currency that fluctuates in volume, because fluctuation in volume has the effect to increase and diminish the purchasing power of the currency, and, consequently, to a like degree increases and diminishes the selling price of commodities.

4. In what respect do they differ from greenbacks, except that they bear interest, and will therefore be more desirable to hold, and good for their face value to pass from hand to hand, and for transmission as exchange, earning something for the holder while in transitu?

5. Shall I "give to my worst thoughts the worst of words?" They might produce a very great enlargement of the volume of the currency; but I hope that is not the object of its advocates.

6. Why, should John Doe buy from the Secretary of the Treasury $10,000 of three sixty-fives, paying for them in greenbacks, the Secretary of the Treasury, as required by the act, would immediately pay out the greenbacks for gold-bearing bonds. By this process the volume of the greenbacks is neither increased nor diminished. John Doe goes West and buys wheat, in the payment of which the three sixty-fives would be most acceptable. The three sixty-fives, being found useful, would stay out as currency, and a very good kind, too, because it would work faithfully night and day for the owner in earning interest from the Government. Clearly this proceeding would add $10,000 to the volume of the currency. The first $100,000 of greenbacks in this way could be used ten times over in the same manner, and thus be the instrument and means of getting $1,000,000 of three sixty-fives into circulation without reducing the volume of greenbacks one dollar. So it seems to me. Who will give bond that something like this will not happen on a large and disastrous scale if the bill should pass?

In one view the three sixty-fives are attractive to my mind, and that is in the fact that they are pretty nearly consols. That is to say, the Government could never call them in nor retire them, except by buying them in the market at a price to suit holders. They would be an annuity, to be terminated only at the option of the holder. The low rate of interest would probably render them unobjectionable in this respect.

It is a new proposal for the Government to borrow money and issue obligations payable only at the option of the holder, the Government having no option; and for this reason, if no other, should not be passed by the influence of enthusiasm without pretty deliberate consideration.

I regret that the question arises in my mind whether the plan of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is safe, because I cannot see where it will lead. Probably it is my fault that I do not divine its future effects. What I said just now shows what I am somewhat afraid might happen if the bonds were extensively taken. You well know my aversion to every system which will permit the volume of the currency to be materially contracted or expanded at the volition of individuals or corporations. I think it would be much like allowing individuals and corporations to debase our gold and silver coins. The integrity of the volume of the currency is the mainstay of the country. If this bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has much effect, will it not be in the direction of inflation of volume, and to which there is no limit in the system itself short of the total volume of our bonded debt, and perhaps not even that limit? His bonds would probably buy cotton and tobacco at the South, and wheat, corn, pork, and cattle at the West. They would be better than greenbacks, because while so used they would be drawing interest for the owner. If this should turn out to be so, the Government would be supplying a valuable currency to the people at a large cost to the Treasury, would it not?

If the plan I have proposed cannot succeed, it seems to me that the best thing we can do is to fight for the statu quo, by opposing other schemes. My belief is that whatever other new scheme shall be adopted will be unpopular, because it will look to and will be expected to bring about specie payment, or what is called resumption, and will surely fail and disappoint and offend everybody.

Let us not fly to extremes and merit the epitaph of the valetudinarian, "I was well, wished to be better, sent for a doctor, took physic, and here I lie."

The currency proposed by this bill is valuable as money for all the reasons that make gold and silver valuable, with the additional advantage that it cannot be raised in its gross amount except by deliberate act of the sovereignty, nor be drawn away from us by financial incidents and conditions outside of our sovereignty.

It cannot fail to be seen that an incident of the adoption of my measure will be the withdrawal of $400,000,000 of United States demand obligations without the cost or loss of one dollar to any American citizen, contract the public debt to that amount, and relieve the people from the imposition of taxes in some form to that extent. If there is any other plan before Congress that will accomplish this, or the one-half or one-fourth of it, I might vote for it could I do no better. And it would put an end to that volume of pyrotechnic eloquence with which the atmosphere of Washington is constantly illuminated in the debates upon the plighted faith and supposititious tarnished honor of Uncle Sam, because he does not incontinently call in and pay off the greenbacks, while he has not the first dollar with which to do so, and while no sane citizen desires it to be done, and while a large proportion, mayhap a majority, of Congress and the people earnestly demand that, instead of redeeming any, more shall be issued.

It is, of course, known from history that gold and silver came to be used as barter-money first, and after that coined currency, when civilization had hardly dawned upon mankind, and while yet it was the belief of all, and the religion of many, that the world was flat and stationary, and that the solar system was a panorama unrolled before the eyes of mankind, like Barnum's painted show in the Coliseum; but as civilization and commerce advanced the fact was established that gold and silver would not serve the purposes of advanced ideas and commercial needs, a resort was had to the aids of paper currency to help out the deficiencies and fill up the short-comings of the precious metals; that age by age, generation by generation, has seen a constant increase of the paper currency, and such increase accepted and justified by all, until the time has come when the paper in commerce bears the proportion to gold and silver of more than ninety-five to five.

Having traveled so far from metallic toward a paper circulation, with conceded benefit to mankind, perhaps it would be well or better to complete the journey, rather than at this late day to turn back.

A word on the bill reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency (H. R. No. 1572) "to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and to establish free banking, and for other purposes." (By the way, this term "free banking" is likely to mislead. It means, as used here, a virtually unlimited issue of currency by the banks. Sensible men predict that gold will be at 200 in less than six months after the passage of such a bill.)

Section 3 provides—

That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act, and of the several acts in amendment thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used only for the redemption of such circulation; and when the circulating notes of any such association or associations shall be presented, assorted or unassorted, for redemption, in sums of $1,000 or any multiple thereof, to the Secretary of the Treasury, or to the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Secretary of the Treasury to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally, on the first day of each month, or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; whereupon each association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum, in United States notes, equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed. And when such redemptions have been so reimbursed, the circulating notes so redeemed, or, if worn, mutilated, or defaced, new notes instead, shall be forwarded to the respective associations: Provided, That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the costs of redemption and of supplying new notes in place of those redeemed. And the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the costs of engraving and printing their circulating notes: And provided further, That the entire amount of United States notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $400,000,000, now authorized by existing law.

How would this work (section 3) if conditions should arise making greenbacks more valuable than bank-notes? When all the sharp operators would engage in picking up bank-notes and presenting them for redemption? Would it not give an opportunity for a greenback "corner?"

Section 8 provides—

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue, at the beginning of each and every month from and including July, 1874, two millions of United States notes not bearing interest, payable in gold two years after date, of such denominations as he shall deem expedient, not less than ten dollars each, in exchange, and as a substitute, for the same amount of the United States notes now in circulation, which shall be canceled and destroyed, and not reissued. And any excess of gold in, or hereafter coming into, the Treasury of the United States, after payment of interest on the public debt and supplying any deficiency in the revenues provided to meet the current expenses of the Government, shall hereafter be retained as a reserve for the redemption of such notes.

Section 8 would add a third description of paper money. If the new gold notes should be found to be better than the greenbacks and bank-notes, as is probable, especially near the date of redemption, they would complicate and disturb the currency, making it of unequal value, and, of course, produce an actual contraction of the currency at the rate of $24,000,000 per year, unless the gold would circulate in its place, which is not likely.

I suppose it is claimed that this bill is intended to lead to a resumption of specie payments, but it is not calculated to produce that result.

Specie payments cannot be resumed until the banks can resume specie payments. It is not a question of intention or will, but of power. It is very easy for a doctor to say to his patient, "It is your duty to get well, and you ought to do so for the sake of your family." But if the patient is already dying, how is he to heed the advice of the doctor? We are told that the words, "Arise, take up thy bed, and walk," were spoken by the Son of God; if they had been uttered by a mere mortal, they would have had as little effect as a law of Congress decreeing resumption of specie payments would now have upon the banks.

The bill might have the effect to lift greenbacks to a par with gold. If it did, the bank-notes would be depressed pro tanto, and the banks would be without the ability to resume and maintain specie payments.

The most prominent bill before the Senate is, I believe, that of Senator SHERMAN. This has been noticed by a correspondent of the New York Times, and it seems to me that fatal objections are raised against its passage. I quote:

Hon. Mr. SHERMAN'S bill has indeed been a great disappointment to his friends as well as to the entire commercial and financial community. After patiently waiting for so many weeks, great expectations were naturally entertained; but, alas! the prodigy reaches us still-born. It is the old story over again of the mountain bringing forth a mouse.

From the high position held by Mr. SHERMAN as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, surely some practicable measures were relied upon calculated to bring us back at an early day to the golden age, or, as I may properly call it, to the era of constitutional money, instead of which not even palliative remedies for our financial ills have been suggested by the honorable Senator. Carefully examining Mr. SHERMAN'S bill, I have come to the sad conclusion that its foundation is made of delusion and imprudence—two dangerous materials to build with. We have not even the consolation to say that half a loaf is better than none, for we have neither crust nor crumb.

It is due to the honorable Senator to give him a priori credit for his honest intentions, if for nothing else; and in justice to him, I intend to analyze carefully the first section of the bill. Fault-finding is of all things the most disagreeable task; but there are moments when it behooves every man who feels interested in his country's welfare to look upon matters and things in their true light, and not to shrink from what he considers a duty.

When the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee seriously presents a bill:

"Be it enacted, That on the 1st day of January, 1875, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to pay on demand at the office of the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, to any holder of United States notes to the amount of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, in exchange for such notes, an equal amount of the gold coin of the United States"—

when there will be no such coin available in the Treasury of the United States, who will dare to say that the word "delusion" is not appropriate under the circumstances?

A doubt must have arisen in Mr. SHERMAN'S mind of the impossibility to redeem the legal-tenders in coin, for the bill reads further:

"Or in lieu of coin he may, at his option, issue in exchange for said notes an equal amount of coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, and of such denominations, of fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value at the pleasure of the United States after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest payable quarterly in such coin at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum."

At first sight this "option" looks fair enough, and would, of course, be very acceptable to holders of legal-tenders, who could thus exchange every $1,000 of United States notes for United States bonds, which sell at about 115 in the open market. How is it, however, with the United States? To sell their bonds at an actual loss of 15 per cent. does not look like a real smart Yankee bargain; indeed, how such an idea could ever have entered the head of Mr. SHERMAN remains to be explained. There are a great many honest people in this world, but a large number of them are imprudent.

The French have a capital proverb—"Jeter le manche après la cognée"—which in plain English means "to throw the helve after the hatchet;" and this is in reality what Mr. SHERMAN'S bill does. Self-interest is the great motive-power of poor humanity. Long before the 1st day of January, 1875, every available legal-tender would be hoarded, ostensibly with a view to secure the new bonds, but in reality for the purpose of selling them at once in the market at the highest price. First, we shall experience a violent contraction in the money market; next, an enormous rise in the premium on gold, with a corresponding depreciation of the purchasing power of the unlawful money commonly called national-bank currency, and we will see for a short time greenbacks ruling seemingly at a premium—not in gold value, but contrasted with the ordinary currency. All this will unsettle business. Imports as well as exports will be stopped to such an extent that the late panic and the never to be forgotten "Black Friday" will be completely overshadowed. After various Waterloos we may be sure to have our financial Sedan, thanks to Mr. SHERMAN'S redemption plaster cure.

Mr. SHERMAN'S bill goes on as follows:

"And the Secretary of the Treasury may reissue the United States notes so received, or, if they are canceled, may issue United States notes to the same amount, either to purchase or redeem the public debt, or to meet the current payments for the public service; and the said bonds and the interest thereon shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority; and the said bonds shall have set forth and expressed upon their face the above-specified conditions, and shall, with their coupons, be made payable at the Treasury of the United States."

If I understand aright the true meaning of the preceding part of the bill, the Secretary of the Treasury may apply the legal-tender notes received in exchange for the new issue of bonds to the purchase of other portions of the public debt, such as the 6 per cent. interest-bearing bonds, which rate to-day at 120, and which will eventually rise still higher as the premium on gold increases; or he may reissue the United States notes to meet the current payments for the public service—no limit whatever being fixed—leaving virtually the legal-tender circulation altogether to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. This process of frictional conversion is but a rose-colored inflation, the thorns of which are artistically hidden from view. However artfully contrived, the deception will not stand investigation. The plan of exchanging the bonds at par for legal-tenders and of purchasing another class of bonds at a very high premium, will be looked upon by the people as a somewhat novel way of doing business, by no means complimentary to our financial leaders. Indeed, it is humiliating to believe, if we take Mr. SHERMAN'S bill as a fair exposition of the views of the Finance Committee, that we should be compelled to resort to subterfuge and trickery for the restoration of the nation's credit or to meet the probable deficit in our revenues. If the modus operandi shall consist merely of legerdemain dexterity, let us frankly acknowledge that we have not yet the right captain capable of rescuing the financial ship from its perilous position amid the numerous breakers.

"Humanum est errare." It is therefore hoped that Mr. SHERMAN'S bill will be quietly withdrawn.

The circulating medium of the United States has become a paper currency, and it will remain permanently so. There is no possibility of avoiding this; because the transactions and exchanges are so numerous and of such amounts as to render the use of a metallic currency extremely inconvenient if not impossible. This is independent of the impossibility of procuring the quantity of bullion that would be required for a metallic currency, and the improbability of that currency remaining in the country.

The principles laid down may, if false, be disproved by calm argument, without the aid of influence or combination; but which, if true, cannot be refuted by clamor, and could not be overpowered by numbers or authority without material hazard to the interests of the country.

In conclusion, in order that I may by no possibility be misunderstood, allow me to say that I am opposed alike to inflation or contraction of the currency, under the present circumstances of the country. This bill does not provide for the issue of a single dollar, except by the retiring of one received by the Government, so that the volume of the currency will not by it be increased or lessened. I do not know of any other finance bill that has been debated in Congress but what in practice will do more mischief than good. The bill presented by the Banking and Currency Committee has been more aptly than elegantly termed "a bill of abominations." It ought not to pass.

The bill presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania has to my mind very attractive features. The only thing that makes me hesitate to give it unqualified support is the fear that it may prove a scheme for inflation. To that I am inflexibly opposed until the paper currency of the country shall appreciate to gold value. And this, I have no doubt, will be the effect of the bill I have advocated. This is meant to be the effect of the provision for paying, at first partially and eventually altogether, customs duties in the money of the nation. I sincerely believe the "statu quo" is far better than any change proposed, with the exception of the bill I have advocated, and which I believe the public welfare requires shall be passed by Congress.

Mr. FORT. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CESSNA having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TODD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the President's annual message and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. VANCE, (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BUCKNER: Several petitions of tobacco manufacturers and dealers of the State of Missouri, for the abolition of the import duty on mass or stick licorice, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 2, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON. I present the petition of a large number of citizens of Lebanon, Pennsylvania, stating that, in their opinion, the usefulness and efficiency of the national banking system is seriously impeded by unnecessary restrictions and limitations, and that by removing all restrictions from the national banking system, and permitting the volume of bank circulation to be regulated by the wants and requirements of business, the best interests of the people will be promoted, and at the same time a home market will be created for the bonds of the Government bearing low rates of interest; and praying that Congress will, by suitable legislation, abolish the restrictions and limitations of our national banking system.

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present resolutions passed by the Merchants' Exchange, of Chicago, February 20, 1874, at a meeting called for the purpose of discussing the financial schemes now before Congress, signed by seventy-five leading firms of Chicago; and as the resolutions are brief I will read them:

Whereas measures are pending in Congress, and advocated by the Senators from Illinois and others, having for their object an increase in the volume of currency:

Resolved, That we believe the action of our Senators is influenced by misapprehension of the wants and sentiments of the merchants of this city, whose interests are identified with those of the people of the Northwest.

Resolved, That a forced circulation of irredeemable paper money can only be justified by great and necessitous emergencies, and ought to be restricted as speedily as consistent with public safety; that no such emergency now exists, and any increase of currency would only depreciate that already existing, and disturb and derange values generally.

Resolved, That the faith of the Government has been solemnly pledged to the redemption of its currency, and that its honor is involved in the fulfillment of pledges already too long delayed; and that we recognize no distinction between the Government and ourselves in respect to the ordinary obligation to fulfill promises.

Resolved, That when the signatures of the members of the Merchants' Exchange of Chicago are attached to these resolutions, they be forwarded by the secretary to Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, the chairman of the Finance Committee of the United States Senate.

I am informed that this paper is signed by seventy-five leading firms, representing a business of $60,000,000, and a majority of the wholesale dealers of Chicago. In pursuance of their request, I present the paper, and ask its reference to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN. Are those the resolutions of the grocers of Chicago?

Mr. SHERMAN. The resolutions of the Merchants' Exchange of Chicago. The officers sign the paper, and it is signed by seventy-five firms, as I am informed.

Mr. LOGAN. Although I dislike very much to do so, probably, in order to give the Senate some information on this subject, it would be well enough for me to state the facts in this case, and I will state them as they are.

The grocers of Chicago have an organization that they call the Merchants' Exchange, and from the remarks of the Senator it would be inferred that these people were the merchants of Chicago. About ten days ago—I do not remember the exact date, though I have it in my drawer and can refer to it easily—a meeting was called of the Merchants' Exchange of Chicago. Ten men met and passed those resolutions, and but ten. They have been from that time to this carrying the resolutions around and getting signatures to them. That is the fact about it. When the Senator from Ohio reads those resolutions as the resolutions of the Merchants' Exchange of Chicago, I state to the Senate that ten men met and held that meeting, and have carried those resolutions around from that time up to the time they were sent on here, getting signers out of that meeting, and they have got seventy-five. These are the facts. I have only to say that these ten men, and the balance making the seventy-five, are not the whole people of Chicago, although they may be worth $60,000,000.

I do not desire to criticise the resolutions. These gentlemen are men of high standing, men of property, men of wealth, and of course they want a contraction of the currency. I suggest to my friend from Ohio that all of us recollect about a meeting that was held in London once, composed, I believe, of three persons, and they resolved that "we, the people of England," demand so and so. I am reminded by this petition of that very resolution.

I will state further, that a few days ago a petition was presented with one hundred and seventy names to it, claiming to be from the Board of Trade of Chicago. I wish to inform the Senate that the Board of Trade of Chicago consists of sixteen hundred and twenty-six men. That is all I have got to say about it. They are gentlemen highly esteemed in the country, but they do not represent all the people of that city.

But inasmuch as it is fashionable to present petitions—and when I present a petition I do not talk about the amount of wealth the petitioners have—I have one petition here signed by, I suppose——

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend misunderstood me; I did not say they represented any wealth. I simply said what they requested me to state, that they represent $60,000,000 of business and a majority of the wholesale trade of Chicago. I do not know anything about the facts.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not questioning the amount of business they represent at all, and I have nothing to say of the character of the men. They are respectable gentlemen, all of them. I know the most of them myself. But I will say—I have not the letter here, but left it on my table down at my rooms—that I received last night a letter from one of the gentlemen whose name is signed to that paper, Mr. Sherwood, a wholesale tea merchant in Chicago, in which he says that his name appears there without any authority whatever; he knew nothing about it. I presume he is the only man, however, whose name appears there without authority.

But, Mr. President, I hold in my hand and desire to present a petition signed by seven men of Chicago. I will not say anything about their wealth; but I will say this, that six of these seven men have done more to build up Chicago than any other six men or any other set of men who have signed petitions on the other side of this question. It is signed by Potter Palmer, Samuel J. Walker, Peter Schuttler, B. F. Allen, T. L. Dobbin, J. Young Scammon, and H. O. Stone; and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

Mr. LOGAN. I also present a petition from Chicago, signed by the mayor and a majority of the aldermen of that city, petitioning for an increase of the currency.

I also present a petition signed by about 100 men, composing the leading business firms of the city of Chicago, petitioning for an increase of the currency.

I also present the petition of 311 business men of Chicago, praying for an increase of the currency.

I also present the petition of numerous manufacturers and business men of Chicago, amounting to about 100, declaring that the real and personal property during the last decade has increased in value more than 86 per cent., and the value of manufactured products more than 124 per cent., and since June 30, 1868, the currency circulation has been contracted about $250,000,000; that the people representing the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests of the West and South believe that the currency is not sufficient for the business of the country, and also believe that a contraction of the currency is in the interest of eastern capital, to the detriment of western and southern industry, and means paralyzed business, extortionate interest, and low wages. This is signed by about 100 manufacturers and business men of Chicago.

I also present the petition of 480 respectable citizens of the city of Chicago—I will not state their wealth, but they are respectable men—making the same statements, and asking for an increase of the currency.

I also present a petition, signed by every business man except two, as the letter accompanying it states, in the city of Evanston, twelve miles north of Chicago, asking for the same thing.

I also present the petition of 3,860 business men, manufacturers, small traders, dealers, and other good citizens of the city of Chicago, asking the same thing.

I move the reference of all these petitions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Thomas Rogers and various other citizens of Maine, praying the passage of an act granting pensions to all soldiers mustered into the service during the war of 1812, or to the widows of such; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of a survey of the water routes between the navigable waters of the Minnesota River and the Red River of the North, to ascertain the feasibility of connecting the two by canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in relation to the extension of the provisions of the timber-culture act of March 3, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Good Templars, of Colorado Territory, and the petition of the Genesee County Lodge of Good Templars, of the State of New York, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented additional papers in support of the application of R. Eickemeyer for the extension of letters-patent for a machine for stitching linings into hats; which, with his petition on the files of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of citizens of Southern Kansas, praying for the opening of a road from the mouth of the Walnut River in Kansas to the mouth of the Main Cache River in Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the removal of the Prairie band of Indians from the Pottawatomie reservation in Stockton County in that State, and the sale of said land to actual settlers; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of the Leavenworth Medico-Chirurgical Society, praying the passage of the bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of David Baker, of Atchison, Kansas, praying an amendment of the pension laws; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Jules L. Williams, late a second lieutenant in the Forty-second Regiment United States Colored Troops, praying for an invalid pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of T. L. Wilson, D. M. Gardner, J. P. Little, and other citizens of the State of Kansas, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of Kansas, praying the passage of a law granting a bounty and donating one hundred and sixty acres of land to the soldiers and heirs of such who served in the late war; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the reappraisement of the lands in Bourbon County in that State, known as the New York Indian lands; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition and papers of R. W. Riddell, praying for pay and commutation as first lieutenant Company C, One hundred and forty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON presented the following resolution of the Legislature of Iowa; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, and ordered to be printed:

Joint resolution relative to shipment of grain.

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested, to favor by their influence and votes, the enactment of a law by Congress, requiring railroad companies operating a railroad or railroads which begin in one State and terminate in another, to provide scales at each shipping station on their road, by which they may weigh the contents of each car loaded. Said law to provide also that it shall be the duty of said railroad companies to weigh the contents of every car loaded with any kind of grain for shipment to be sent over their road, giving the shipper, or person so loading said car, an accurate weigh-bill stating the number of bushels or pounds which said car contains; and it shall be the further duty of said company to again weigh the contents of the car at the point of delivery, giving the shipper or owner of the grain with which the car is loaded, an accurate weigh-bill of the number of bushels or pounds contained in the car at the place and time of delivery; and, further, if there be any loss of grain between its shipping point and point of delivery, the company shall make good such loss.

Approved February 24, 1874.
Respectfully forwarded by

JOSIAH T. YOUNG,
Secretary of State.

Mr. ALLISON presented the petition of graduates of the United States Naval Academy, of the date of June 4, 1869, asking to be restored to their graduating rank in their class and upon the official list of the officers of the Navy of the United States, of which they allege they have been illegally and unfairly deprived; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of N. H. Wood, a citizen of Wisconsin, remonstrating against the contraction of the legal-tender notes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of William P. Ross, principal chief of the Cherokee Nation, protesting against the passage of the House bill entitled "An act for the relief of the settlers on the Cherokee strip in Kansas;" which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, transmitting information in relation to the condition of the Kansas Indians recently removed to the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of the mayor and aldermen of the city of Dubuque, Iowa, praying that the Clinton bridge, at Clinton, Iowa, be opened to the use of all railroad companies who desire to cross the same; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALCORN. I present a memorial of citizens of De Soto County, Mississippi, who are members of the New Harmony Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry. They pray Congress to pass a law restoring to the Southern States the cotton tax, which they claim to have been illegally, unconstitutionally, and wrongfully extorted from the Southern States in a time of great need in those States. They represent the condition of the Southern States now as being deplorable, and they trace their misfortunes back as a source to this wrongful taking of the cotton tax. The memorial is numerously signed. I move, as there is a legal question involved in this case, that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOGY presented a petition of manufacturers of tobacco, and citizens of Saint Louis, and members of the Legislature of Missouri, praying for the repeal of the import duty on mass or stick licorice; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BAYARD presented a petition of tobacco manufacturers of the State of Missouri, praying for the abolition of the import duty on mass or stick licorice; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARVEY presented the petition of William P. Tomlinson, D. L. Phillips, and other citizens of Morris County, Kansas, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of Harriet J. Peabody and Frances M. Peabody, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present the petition of colored voting citizens of McMinn County, Tennessee, earnestly praying that the fourteenth amendment be so enforced by appropriate legislation that any law, rule, or regulation emanating from any State, municipality, corporation, chartered company, society, association, or legalized body, making any discrimination against any person by the use of any words having reference to color or blood, be declared null and void. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHURZ presented a resolution of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of the removal of obstructions from the channel of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the transfer of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the War Department; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the immediate payment by the United States of certain adjusted claims of citizens of Kansas for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of members of the State central committee of the union republican party of South Carolina, in reply to certain allegations contained in a memorial of a so-called tax-payers, convention of that State, heretofore presented to Congress, in respect to excessive taxation imposed by the present State government; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STOCKTON presented the petition of Elijah Laws, chief engineer of the United States Navy, asking the passage of an act providing that his services as first assistant engineer of the United States Navy shall be in all and every respect as though he had received a warrant appointing him to that position on the 17th March, 1863, the date his class was warranted as first assistant engineers, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 27th ultimo, approved and signed an act (S. No. 437) to restore William Kilburn, of San Francisco, California, to the Navy of the United States, as an ensign; and, on the 2d instant, an act (S. No. 493) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Arkansas.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. ALCORN, it was Ordered, That the petition of citizens of Mississippi, praying compensation for the value of a house of worship at Rienzi, Mississippi, destroyed by the Army of the United States during the late war, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. ALCORN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Randolph Mott, praying to be allowed a pension, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Christiana Bailey, widow of David Bailey, late of Company B, Thirteenth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 548) granting a pension to Christiana Bailey.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 281) ceding to the several States within whose limits they respectively lie the beds of unsurveyed lakes and other bodies of water, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report it back with amendments; and I desire to ask the present consideration of this bill. The amendments to it remove every objectionable feature, and I think it will commend itself to the judgment of every Senator on its reading; and should any one desire any information on the subject, I shall cheerfully respond to any question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana reports a bill, and asks for its consideration. It will be read for information, as proposed to be amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the United States do hereby cede to the several States, within whose limits they respectively lie, the beds of all lakes and ponds and bayous of water not navigable, which have not been included in the surveys of the public lands and reservations, by reason of their being covered by water, and where all the contiguous surveyed lands have been granted, sold, or taken under the pre-emption or homestead laws, to the end that the proprietary right in and jurisdiction over the beds of such unsurveyed lakes, ponds, and bayons may vest in the said States respectively.

Mr. WEST. Has the Senate consented to consider the bill at the present time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. WEST. I shall feel constrained to object.

Mr. PRATT. I hope my friend from Louisiana will indicate what his objections are. I think I can reply to them very readily. The Committee on Public Lands were unanimous in reporting the bill as it has been amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana objects to the present consideration of the bill, as the Chair understands.

Mr. PRATT. I do not think it will lead to any extended debate.

Mr. WEST. I do not know whether it will or not; but it suggests a subject of vast magnitude, and one that it seems to me requires consideration and deliberation by the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. When we ceded the swamp lands to the several States, it has been shown that a very large and gross amount of fraud was practiced by which the United States lost any amount of public lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana insists on his objection, and the bill must lie over.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. This seems to be a measure of a similar kind.

Mr. PRATT. There is a report in the case, which I move to have printed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 549) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the steamer Chicora, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 550) to reorganize and fix the time for holding United States district courts for the State of Alabama; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 551) to provide for the settlement of claims of loyal persons against the United States occurring during the late rebellion, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 552) to refund to E. & J. Koch certain customs duties; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, as a slight contribution to the literature on the subject of finance, I present a very brief memorial of Amasa W. Carr, of the city of New York, in relation to the Government finance; and in that connection, by request, I ask leave to introduce a bill for the retirement of the national-bank notes, for the refunding of our non-taxable bonds into 5½ per cent. interchangeable bonds, and for the resumption of specie payments. I present this bill by request, and ask that it, with the memorial, be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is that in the nature of the views of an individual?

Mr. WRIGHT. It is only about a half-dozen lines.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 553) for the retirement of the national-bank notes, for the refunding of our non-taxable bonds into a 5½ per cent. interchangeable bond, and for the resumption of specie payments; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is suggested that it is contrary to precedent to have the memorial printed. I therefore ask only that the bill be printed.

The bill was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 554) for the relief of Philip Pendleton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 555) to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to receive and entertain an application of William Beale Hale for letters-patent; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 556) for the relief of William R. Rutherford and George Kairns, of the First Michigan Cavalry Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 557) for the relief of the Flathead Indians; which was read twice by its title, referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 558) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use funds from sale of lands for the benefit of the Osage Indians; which was read twice by its title, referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 559) to enable the central branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company to submit its claims against the United States under existing laws to the decision of the Supreme Court; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE JEFFERSON STATUE.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to call up the joint resolution reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in relation to the bronze statue, presented by Lieutenant U. P. Levy, of Thomas Jefferson. Senators will find in the report the historical facts that make this resolution necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to its being taken up, subject to objection; but if it leads to debate I must object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It must be objected to now, or it will be before the Senate during the morning hour till disposed of.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It will not take five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WRIGHT. I object.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move, then, that all prior orders be postponed for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator from Vermont wish to take this up for action?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Certainly. I think with three minutes' explanation the Senate will have no objection.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not think the Senator from Iowa will object if he understands that it is not to be taken up for debate, but merely for action after a word of explanation.

Mr. WRIGHT. My understanding is that, according to our practice, a bill may be taken up subject to objection during the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not aware of any such practice. Bills have been read, and resolutions read, for information, so that Senators could determine whether they would object or not; but if the consideration of a bill is commenced, it is then, like any other business, before the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont has moved to proceed to the consideration of this joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) in relation to the bronze statue of Jefferson, presented to Congress by Uriah P. Levy, late an officer in the United States Navy, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that the late Commodore Uriah P. Levy, while a lieutenant of the United States Navy, in 1834, procured in Paris a bronze statue of Jefferson by the celebrated sculptor David, which was presented by him, through Congress, to his fellow-citizens of the United States, and to which attention is now called by his brother, Jonas P. Levy, who requests that the statue, if not accepted by Congress, shall be returned to the heirs of the late Commodore Levy; and the resolution accepts the statue with grateful appreciation, and directs the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds to properly prepare and place the same in the National Statuary Hall of the Capitol.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It seems that in 1834 Lieutenant Levy made a presentation of a bronze statue, by the celebrated sculptor David, to his fellow-citizens of the United States. His letter was communicated to both Houses of Congress, and by each House referred to the Joint Committee on the Library. That committee reported back to the Senate in May of the same year that they had sent a letter of acceptance, with thanks, to Lieutenant Levy, and asked to have the statue placed on the east front of the Capitol grounds. That report to the Senate was concurred in, so far as appears, unanimously.

The same committee reported to the House of Representatives in June of the same year a resolution of like effect, but the record does not show that it was identically one and the same resolution, (though that is probable,) for they asked the concurrence of the Senate, which appears to have been already given. Then in the House there arose a slight opposition to the resolution. There was no opposition in the Senate. In the House it seems to have been criticised because it was from a lieutenant of the Navy and not from a commander, and it was objected by members of the House from Virginia that they ought not to receive a statue or a gift except from some distinguished source. And then, in addition, it was said that the likeness to Jefferson was not a good one. Senators will find a full account in the report now lying upon their desks of the proceeding in relation to this matter at the time specified. But the House concurred in the resolution of the joint committee by a vote of 69 to 55. Subsequently, in 1835, a resolution was introduced in the House by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, directing the commissioner of public buildings to remove the bronze statue from the Rotunda to some suitable place for its preservation until the final disposition of it be determined by Congress.

And these are all the records that can be found in relation to this statue. For a long time it remained in the Rotunda of the Capitol, but was at length removed to the front of the Executive Mansion, where it stood until the last year, when it was removed to the east side of the Executive Mansion. An inspection of the statue shows that, being exposed to the open weather, it is receiving considerable injury. I have some doubts as to the quality of the bronze; I think it is an inferior quality of metal; but at the same time the statue is a work of a very distinguished sculptor, and in the eyes of many artists has great value, although it is severely criticised by others.

Under the circumstances it appeared to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that Congress could do nothing less than accept the statue in a form that would remove all doubt about the fact, and place it where its preservation would be secured; and they have accordingly reported the resolution presented. I may add that the brother of the late Commodore Levy, who now owns the Monticello homestead of Thomas Jefferson, has asked to have Congress either accept the statue or return it to the heirs of his brother. I think there can be no hesitation on the part of the Senate as to adopting the resolution reported.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PREPARATION OF UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform the Senate whether the securities of the United States—such as bonds, notes, and fractional currency—have been, and are being, prepared in accordance with the recommendations of the Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment, dated March 3, 1869, and of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of that year, and whether any changes have been made in the plan or method of preparing such securities; and if any change has been made, what such change is, and what is the reason for making such change, and what is the method now adopted for the preparation of such securities, and what are the safeguards against the fraudulent issue of such securities.

WISCONSIN CENTRAL RAILROAD.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to consider Senate bill No. 512, which was reported from the Committee on Public Lands a few days since, with an amendment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 512) to extend the time for completing the Wisconsin Central Railroad. It proposes to extend the time specified in the ninth section of the act of Congress approved May 5, 1864, entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the State of Wisconsin," for the completion of the road mentioned in the third section of the act, and for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by the act to aid in the construction of the road, until the 31st of December, 1876, to the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, a corporation established by the laws of the State of Wisconsin, and entitled by the laws of that State to take the lands granted in and by the third section.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with an amendment in line 11, after the words "December, 1876," to strike out the words, "to the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, a corporation established by the laws of the State of Wisconsin, and entitled by the laws of that State to take the lands granted in and by said third section."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIQUOR-TRAFFIC COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Delaware modified that amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. The words objected to were stricken out, I believe, by the Clerk.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I have no objection to it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the amendment pending is that offered by the Senator from Delaware as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. WRIGHT. I see no necessity in the world for this amendment. The friends of the bill around me, however, see no objection to it, and I only wish to interpose my objection, and to say that I see no necessity on earth for the amendment as the bill stands; but whatever may be the result on this amendment, I trust that we shall have a vote and have the bill reported to the Senate, and get it out of the way this morning. I may state now, so far as the amendments made in committee are concerned, that there is but one on which I shall ask a vote of the Senate, that having special reference, using the language of the amendment as I now remember it, "to revenue and taxation." I think the Senator will accomplish his object by inserting the amendment in another part of the bill, where it will be much less objectionable. The amendment was passed hurriedly on Friday morning; and in my great anxiety to get the bill through I did not observe the exact connection in which it was offered. This amendment out of the way, I trust the bill will be reported to the Senate, and that we shall have a vote upon it this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, to insert at the end of the first section of the committee's amendment as amended the following:

And also ascertain whether the evil of drunkenness has been decreased or increased thereby; whether the use of opium as a stimulant and substitute for alcoholic drinks has become more general in consequence of such legislation; and whether public morals have been improved thereby. It shall also be the duty of said commissioners to gather information and take testimony as to whether the evil of drunkenness exists to the same extent or more so in other civilized countries, and whether those foreign nations that are considered the most temperate in the use of stimulants are so through prohibitory laws, and also to what degree prohibitory legislation has affected the consumption and manufacture of malt and spirituous liquors in this country.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amend ment proposed by the Committee on Finance as amended.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to make a further amendment. In section 2 of the amendment of the committee, on line 2, after the word "sal ary," I move to insert the words, "all of whom shall not be advocates of prohibitory legislation in respect to the traffic in malt or distilled spirits."

Mr. PRATT. I do not wish to say anything in respect to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware, but do wish to submit some general remarks in relation to the merits of the bill itself, promising to be brief.

The opponents of this bill agree with its friends in deploring the evils of intemperance. It is a happy circumstance that at the outset we are all agreed that intemperance is a scourge and an evil, and that continually. Some think, however, that this evil is not to be corrected by prohibitory or restrictive legislation of any kind. Others think that legislation, even if proper, is to proceed from the States and the States alone, and fear that the creation of this commission is an entering-wedge to legislation on the subject by Congress. Others, again, express the opinion that the people of this country are in possession already of all needful information upon these subjects of inquiry. Having determined to support the bill by my vote, I wish to give my reasons in the fewest possible words, for I appreciate the anxiety of my friend from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] to reach a vote upon the bill.

Our Constitution was formed to promote the general welfare of the people. So it is announced in the preamble. Congress makes laws to no other end than this. Whatever concerns that welfare must therefore always be a proper subject of inquiry. Now if the manufacture of malt and alcoholic liquors, or the traffic in them, affects the industries of the country, or affects the health or morals of the people, public or private virtue; if its tendency be to cause pauperism, or crime, or both; if the use of stimulants makes men less able or willing to perform their duties as citizens, or as husbands, parents, or sons; if it affects them injuriously in the relation of voters, jurors, legislators, magistrates, or in the exercise of any official functions, where the whole or any part of the body-politic is concerned or likely to suffer, the information should be obtained and given to the public in such form as will command confidence and enable the States to legislate, if Congress has not the power.

It is said that we have this information now. It is argued that the whole field of inquiry has already been occupied; that the pulpits, the lecture-rooms, the temperance societies, the press, have spread before the people all needful statistics upon the subject, and discussed with infinite ability every method, legal and moral, to stay this scourge. I do not undervalue the argument. Probably if all which is valuable that has been said and written on this subject during the discussions of half a century were collected and methodized, this would be so. But the advantages of the commission instituted by this bill will be that this very collection will be made, and the facts gathered will possess the merit of being thoroughly reliable. The men who collect them will be selected, in the language of the bill, "solely with reference to personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation of the whole subject."

Sir, the value of testimony of any kind depends upon our confidence in the witness. We demand that he shall be honest, that he shall be impartial, and that he shall have full and reliable information upon the subject of which he testifies. Very well; this commission is to be composed of such men, and we give them a full year in which to prosecute their inquiries. They will. as a national commission, be able to reach every source of information, official as well as unofficial, abroad as well as at home. They will have ample time to collect and sift the evidence upon every branch of the inquiry. The whole mass of information obtained will be digested and systematized. We shall know then how much of the capital of the country is employed in these pursuits; how many men are engaged in the manufacture and traffic; what proportion of the product is employed for chemical, and mechanical, and medicinal uses; how much is consumed in drink. We shall know then what proportion of the people use these drinks habitually and to their hurt; how many occasionally; and we shall know, too, how far the industries of the country are affected by the use of alcoholic and malt liquors; what proportion of the men who tenant our jails and penitentiaries have committed crime or broken the peace under their influence; and how many families are paupers in consequence of their use.

In this report will be combined every species of information on the subject necessary for legislation, if that shall be thought the best means of reaching the evil. Those who think this evil is to be reached only by moral appliances will know the methods which have been adopted, and read the history of their success or failure. Thus, sir, the whole country will be able to judge as to the means to be tried hereafter. The report will be a hand-book for all, and especially for legislators, national and State. We shall know then just what has been effected in the States under the different systems tried by them from time to time in the way of prohibition and regulation. We shall likewise be furnished with comparisons of drunkenness in this and other civilized nations, and know what methods have proved most potent to grapple with the evil in other countries.

Sir, no one who loves his country can be insensible to the value of such a compilation as this, and no one should hesitate to vote the little money needed to acquire this information, when it is considered that these commissioners are to serve without pay. Will this measure lead to some good, is the only question that should be asked.

Sir, for myself I would fain do something for the cause of temperance. Gladly would I link my name with any measure that may stay the flood of intemperance, and find my highest satisfaction in the blessings of the afflicted families plunged in grief by its ravages. There are thousands of sorrow-laden hearts all over the country that wait upon our action in this first movement, which lays the foundation for a future one by the whole nation against this sin and crime. Ears that are careless as to what transpires in these halls in ordinary legislation are strained to catch every word spoken here of encouragement and hope in answer to the humble petitions they have sent here by thousands.

Mr. President, I am not troubled about the question of our power to institute this inquiry. I respect but do not share the scruples of the honorable Senator from Connecticut who sits before me, [Mr. FERRY.] Twice has his voice been lifted in this Chamber against this bill on the ground that by it we are trenching upon the reserved rights of the States. But looking to the Constitution, confessedly Congress may legislate on the whole subject of the manufacture and traffic so far as the Territories are concerned. So, too, in relation to this District; and what we may do in the Territories and in this District we may do in all forts, arsenals, magazines, and dock-yards, and in all places, in fact, where the jurisdiction of the United States is exclusive. Who doubts the power of Congress to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces, and under that power, expressly delegated, to interdict wholly the use of alcoholic and malt drinks in the Army and Navy? Who can doubt that under the power to regulate commerce among the several States, the traffic in these liquors might be prohibited between the States? The same clause in the Constitution gives Congress the power to regulate commerce among the Indian tribes. Many years ago that power was exerted in prohibiting the introduction of ardent spirits among the Indians. As far back as 1834 it was prohibited, under a penalty of $1,000, to set up and continue a distillery in the Indian country for the manufacture of ardent spirits; and the Indian agent or superintendent could employ the military forces of the United States in destroying it. Equally was it made an offense to introduce them into the Indian country, or to sell, barter, or give them away to Indians. Spirits were outlawed there, and any person in the service of the United States could destroy them on sight.

Again, sir, we have between sixty and seventy thousand officers, military, naval, and civil. May we not make drunkenness in them a crime, a disqualification? May we not legislate to prevent it as to them?

But I need not multiply cases. I find in these references abundant power to institute this commission and to legislate afterward, to some extent, but to what extent I do not think it necessary to define at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the centennial bill, so called, on which the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WRIGHT. I appeal to the Senator from California if he will not let us have a vote on this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I much prefer to proceed; but I am willing that the vote should be taken without further discussion.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is all I ask—that a vote be had without further discussion. If not, I shall not insist on the bill proceeding now.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the Senator from Indiana concluded?

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware modifies the amendment which he offered, and it will be reported as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment now is, after the word "salary," in section 2, line 2, to insert, "all of whom shall not be advocates of prohibitory legislation or total abstinence, in relation to alcoholic or fermented liquors."

Mr. NORWOOD. I have something to say on this bill in reference to alcoholic liquors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia gives notice of a desire to debate the bill.

Mr. NORWOOD. I have no objection to the question being taken on this amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Georgia has no objection to the question being taken on this amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. If debate is to follow further upon this bill, I shall object to any vote on this amendment, but prefer to have it go over with the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A bill (H. R. No. 2076) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue the use of the cutter Relief as a revenue-cutter, and use said vessel for a boarding-station in Mobile Bay;

A bill (H. R. No. 1920) to amend the fifteenth section of the act approved June 8, 1872, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department;"

A bill (H. R. No. 1284) authorizing the chief clerk of the War Department to sign requisitions on the Treasury during the temporary absence of the Secretary of War;

A bill (H. R. No. 2201) to render available a certain unexpended balance of appropriation;

A bill (H. R. No. 447) extending the time for the completion of the Green Bay and Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal, in the State of Wisconsin;

A bill (H. R. No. 253) for the relief of Thomas Hillhouse, assistant treasurer of the United States in New York City;

A bill (S. No. 365) for the relief of Matthew Woodruff, late first sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Missouri Volunteers; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1225) granting a pension to William E. Prince, of Iowa.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate, being the bill (H. R. No. 1396) in relation to the centennial exhibition, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

> That the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence should be national in character, so as fitly to commemorate the beginning of the American Republic; and that its further conduct should be left in the hands of the commissioners appointed under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, subject to the condition expressly set forth in such act, "that the United States shall not be liable for any expense attending such exhibition or by reason of the same."

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, the task before the Senate would be easy if, in dealing with a question so practical as the one before us, we could be governed only by sentiment. If we were at liberty only to listen to eloquent apostrophes to American liberty, if we only could be governed by the considerations that spring from a desire to appropriately celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of American independence, and were there not back of all this the question of taking large sums of money from the Treasury, our task would be indeed an easy one. We can very readily reply to the question whether we cherish and admire the glory of the country. We can easily say whether we desire that the one hundredth anniversary of national independence shall be celebrated in an exceptionally brilliant manner. There is no difficulty in answering questions like these; and it will be celebrated in an exceptionally brilliant manner whether this exhibition takes place or not.

It matters not what we may do with regard to Philadelphia or with regard to the celebration in any part of the country; there will be lofty eloquence heard in every city, in every hamlet, in every town, wherever there can be assembled a body of men and women to recite the heroic deeds of the past and rejoice in the privileges of the present. There will be that which was anticipated by Adams, in the phrase of Daniel Webster—the ringing of bells, the sound of cannon, and shouts of joy. There will be a celebration all over our broad land, from Canada to the Gulf, and throughout the broad expanse between the two great oceans. Any local celebration, even if it may be, in the phrase of this bill, "under the auspices of the Government of the United States," will be dwarfed into insignificance compared to the general celebration which will be carried on by the whole of the American people in every part of the country.

And, sir, if we were only to be governed by courtesy in this matter toward brother Senators, our task would be very easy; and I desire to pay tribute to the zeal and earnestness with which the Senators from Pennsylvania have urged this matter upon our attention. So far as my friend, the senior Senator, [Mr. CAMERON,] is concerned, I know that that which he has said upon this floor, and which has gone into the RECORD, gives but a very inadequate idea of the earnestness with which he has pressed this matter upon the attention of Senators; and I could but admire the eloquence and earnestness of the other Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] on Friday last, evidently feeble in health and weak in body, but, inspired by his theme, placing its best aspects before the Senate, and pleading so earnestly for legislation which should carry out the idea which he desired to see realized in the city of Philadelphia. Whatever the fate of this bill, I cheerfully bear testimony that it will not be the fault of either of these Senators if it fails. I say, sir, that if this were simply a matter of courtesy, we could very soon come to a conclusion upon it; and certainly I would not be behind other Senators in casting a vote which should give expression to my kindness toward those Senators, and the courtesy which I think belongs to them. But we must look farther for motives for our action.

This is a financial proposition, and I propose to show before I get through that it is simply a financial proposition. I propose to show to the Senate that that which the Executive has already done in the way of invitations to other countries, exceeds in directness and in earnestness anything which has ever been done by any other country in calling the attention of the American Government and people to their expositions and asking our co-operation. I intend to show before I get through, by the documents sent from France and from Austria, calling attention to their exhibitions, that they did it in cold, stately phrase, and not in the impassioned manner in which it is proposed that we shall call their attention to ours in the bill which is now pending before the Senate. But, sir, if I am correct in that—and I shall show that I am—this becomes simply a financial proposition, simply another step toward entangling the feet of Congress, by which it shall have to confess that it has lost all self-respect or accede to any demands on the Treasury which may be made on behalf of this proposition.

Now, sir, I am not ready to go so far as that. We are just recovering from a panic the result of which reached our Treasury; and instead of $60,000,000 ahead of its indebtedness and available on call for the wants of the Government, we have merely $10,000,000, a loss of $50,000,000; so that during this financial year the Treasury, starting out with $60,000,000 beyond question above any probable call on its resources, will go out at the end of the present year with scarcely $10,000,000. Under circumstances like these we might well pause whether we shall go outside of the payment of the interest on the public debt and those necessary direct expenses which we must meet to keep our credit as a people and keep the Government from utter insolvency; whether we shall go outside of that for mere fanciful propositions; whether we can afford, before we are just to ourselves and just to our creditors, to be lavish or generous.

I have before me some figures which I have collated from the best authority I could get upon this proposition, and, with extreme brevity, I desire to justify the statement which I have made in this regard. We had on hand at the commencement of the year, as shown by the Treasury books, $131,192,028 in cash, against which there was liable to be drawn $31,730,000 legal-tenders held for the redemption of certificates of deposit and coin deposits outstanding on call of $39,460,000; so that the total available funds belonging to the Government to meet its current expenses, July 1, 1873, were $60,228,000. It is said at the Treasury that a liberal allowance for the receipts of the year, taking what has been collected and estimating the balance, is $281,779,972, which, with the $60,000,000 I have before referred to, gives us as available for this present year $341,779,100. We have expended already during this fiscal year, on account of the sinking fund, $12,936,450; on account of other appropriations, $177,174,000; and the Government is now liable for appropriations to the sum of $138,381,000, appropriations already made by law, for which the Government at any moment is liable to be required to draw its check; and there is the interest on the public debt, which is $41,286,000, and accruing and unpaid interest, $6,987,000, besides the indefinite and permanent appropriations, $6,825,000, and to complete the purchase of bonds for the sinking fund, $16,254,000, making $399,846,649. Now, saying, as was contended in the other House, that $6,000,000 of uncalled-for interest was brought over from last year, and about the same amount will go over to the next year, and deducting this amount, we shall have $393,000,000 of demands against $341,000,000 available resources, leaving, in fact, if the whole amount of appropriations we have heretofore made, and which we are liable to pay, are called for, a deficiency at the end of the fiscal year of over $52,000,000.

These are startling figures. Taking the $60,000,000 and over which we had at the commencement of the fiscal year, taking all the revenue from customs, from internal revenue, and miscellaneous sources, and adding them together, and then taking the interest on the public debt and the appropriations which we have made and which are calls upon that fund, there is a deficiency at the end of this fiscal year of $52,000,000.

It has been said, and I think with much truth, for I have tried to verify the figures, that $72,000,000 of the amount which I have spoken of in the $138,000,000 will not be called for during the present fiscal year; that they are appropriations which we shall not be required to expend, as for instance the pay of the Army for two years ago, which must be about settled up, and from which there is a considerable balance. But setting aside all these balances not likely to be called for, we have then $20,000,000 at the end of this fiscal year, instead of $60,000,000 at the commencement of it, in the Treasury. And against this there are to be charged, and will be deducted, all the deficiency bills which we may pass at this session of Congress, and which are to be paid during this current fiscal year. The deficiencies already sent in amount to $2,312,839, and I do not think there is any question, and I say so after some examination of the subject, that the probable further deficiencies will be another $1,000,000, making in all about $4,000,000. If we get off with deficiencies of this amount we shall be exceedingly fortunate; for last year the deficiencies passed in deficiency bills amounted to between nine and ten millions of dollars, and it is my recollection that the deficiencies of a single year since the war amounted to $18,000,000; so that if we can bring down the deficiencies to $4,000,000 we shall have performed a great financial feat.

But in addition to this, there are the irregular claims and the new pensions which pass Congress, and pass here every day, which at the lowest estimate cannot be less than $2,000,000. Then there is the award of the mixed commission, which is $2,000,000. The southern claims commission comes in with $900,000 more. These figures which I have read amount to $7,912,839, reducing the $20,000,000 down to $12,381,646 to commence house-keeping with next year, instead of $50,000,000 with which we commenced this year. To this close calculation it is safe to add $2,381,646 more.

Now, we are liable to another panic just as much as we were to the one which took place recently. But the panic alone is not responsible for the depletion of our Treasury. Any one who will go and examine the Treasury books will find that the customs revenue began to fall off before the panic was upon us, and fell off largely. They have fallen off in three years 50 per cent., and there is no reason in the world to suppose that they will go back to the original figures. In fact there are reasons why this cannot be so; and in calling attention to those reasons I wish to remark upon an exaggeration, almost a falsehood, which I have observed going the rounds of some of the papers. My attention was called to it more particularly, however, by the leading papers from the Pacific coast, which I received yesterday in due course of mail. The news published on this side being filtered out and the chaff being separated, this kernel, standing by itself, strongly attracted my attention, and that was, that the appropriations, taking the permanent and indefinite, including interest on the public debt and the appropriations for current expenses of this fiscal year, are $319,000,000, against $290,000,000 last year; that there has been no reduction of the debt this year; that last year there was a reduction of $43,000,000; and it was said that this showed that the administration of the republican party was extremely extravagant; that there was a necessity that these things should be explained, or otherwise the party obviously was running into evil ways, and ought to be thrown out of power. I found some papers which are disposed to be fair toward the republican party, in fact partisan toward the republican party, who, deceived by these specious figures, were arraigning the Administration for its extravagance.

Now, sir, instead of the appropriations for this fiscal year being $319,000,000, the fact is they are but $306,000,000. The mistake which was made in an able address in the other end of the Capitol was caused, first, by taking the $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 deficiency for the previous year and adding that as of the expenses of this year; and then by a confusion in adding in the expenditures for the sinking fund, and deducting them from former years. I need not follow that out minutely; but the fact is, the whole amount is $306,000,000, against an assertion of $319,000,000. But that $306,000,000 is capable of explanation and great reduction; as, for instance, in that great "reform" which we inaugurated, the abolishment of the franking privilege, we authorized an expenditure of $2,000,000 for Department expenditures in the shape of postage-stamps, the printing of which, the actual expenditure of which, to the Government, is, as I have been informed, $8,000; but they stand against our appropriation for $2,000,000. So we deduct that amount, which would leave $304,000,000 instead of $306,000,000. So I might go through other items of this character; but this is a little aside from the purpose of my argument.

So far as the payment of the public debt is concerned, it is true that last year we did pay $43,000,000 of the public debt, and this year, before January last, there was an increase during the fiscal year of the public debt of $9,651,400. But that was reduced last January by the amount of $1,845,326, leaving the reduction before February of $7,806,704. And since I have been speaking I have received a telegram from the Secretary of the Treasury which states that the reduction of the debt during the past month, as I read his figures, is $2,590,047.45. My conversation with him this morning, however, led me to suppose that the reduction was not so great, and it is possible that the reduction is $252,000 instead of $2,590,000. I think the former figure the most probable; but at any rate we are gradually reducing the increase of the debt. But why this increase? The first answer would be, of course, the panic, which accelerated the reduction of the revenue and very largely interfered especially with the receipts from customs; but during the late Congress, at the last session, taking effect during this fiscal year, we reduced the customs revenues $31,172,761, and we reduced the internal revenue $20,651,000; making $51,823,761 less collected from the people, and of course that amount less to be applied either to current expenses or to the reduction of the debt.

But I am informed at the Treasury that this estimate, which is printed in the Book of Estimates as the probable reduction, is at least 10 per cent. too low; so that really the reduction, for this year of the amount of taxes collected from the people is $57,006,584. Here is a complete answer to the challenge to the Administration to show that it is not extravagant, that it is not corrupt. In the first place, we have not expended so much money as was alleged under a mistake. In the next place, if we have not reduced the debt this year by $43,000,000, as we did last year, we have $57,000,000 less to do it with. The panic came and slightly increased the debt, but notwithstanding the panic and notwithstanding the reduction of our income, we have so far recovered as to begin to take off from the increase which was made during the panic.

But, sir, while this shows that the condition of the Treasury is not so bad, and the Administration is not so extravagant as some of our enemies and some of our indiscreet friends, jumping at conclusions, would imply, nevertheless the argument comes back with terrible force that the Treasury is in such a condition that we cannot afford to trifle with it. I have reduced down by legitimate figures, which any gentleman can verify for himself if he will go to the source of authority, the probable amount in the Treasury available outside of taxation to commence the next year with to $10,000,000 or $12,000,000; and in that I have not considered the claim of this District, that we owe them some four millions for improvements around Government property. I have estimated the deficiencies which we will be called upon to pass at the very lowest point, as likewise the new pensions and the claims of various kinds, some of which pass through sometimes with great ease and with fearful rapidity. I have not taken into account any expenditures for further improvement about the Capitol grounds, or any of the one hundred and one miscellaneous matters that we so readily and so properly appropriate money for. Saying nothing of the millions for this centennial commission, we have not the means to proceed with next year without the most extreme solicitude in regard to the appropriations or without an increase of taxation.

Mr. President, on Friday last, for the first time in either House of Congress, we were informed, and frankly, that this exhibition was to cost the Government of the United States money. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] said that it was estimated by the corporation that $3,000,000 would be sufficient; but he insisted that it would be humiliating to the people of the nation if they did not sustain their representatives in voting three, five, or eight millions, if necessary, to sustain this exhibition. In the course of his remarks I put this question to him:

Mr. SARGENT. Do I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania now to say that that is the amount to be appropriated by Congress—from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000?

Mr. SCOTT. I have understood, from very careful estimates made by the board of finance connected with this centennial exposition, that if Congress will appropriate $3,000,000 at the present time—$1,500,000 to be paid during the next fiscal year, and the other $1,500,000 in the year following, that that will enable them to put this exhibition on such a basis as to insure its success, considering the additional contributions they can thereby secure, the receipt of which they may feel reasonably certain, and the proceeds of the buildings, which will be removed after the exposition shall have terminated.

There was the first intimation, sixty hours ago, that the Government of the United States was to be called upon for millions of dollars for this purpose.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator will permit me, doubtless he wishes to be corrected. That was not the first intimation; for when this bill was considered in the other House, and I may properly refer to that now, I believe it was distinctly announced that an appropriation would be needed and expected.

Mr. SARGENT. That was some ten days ago, or during the present session of Congress.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. My argument is not weakened by stating then that at this session, for the first time, we are informed that millions of money are to be appropriated by the Government to this exhibition; and the amount is stated. Why, sir, this thing has been a mistake all the way through. My friend, as I am ready to show him by the Globe, has been mistaken over and over again about it. I cannot have any confidence that he is not mistaken again in saying we will get off with $3,000,000, which he now asserts with so much confidence and upon the representations of the parties who are managing this matter, because I find that from the very first he did not believe this exhibition was going to cost the Government anything. There was a grand, magnificent scheme of raising ten dollars at a time from a great many thousand people, and thus make up $10,000,000, which was to pay for this exhibition. Here is the way in which, when the first bill was brought before Congress in the House of Representatives, it was talked about by a gentleman who is now a member of that body:

I say again I cannot see why there should be any difficulty in the House adopting the location indicated by the bill for this great exhibition on the 4th day of July, 1876. The extent of cost is not to be considered.

They wanted to keep that question of cost out of our minds. Now, however, we are compelled to consider it, and we are compelled to examine the declarations of gentlemen who have this exhibition so much at heart, to see whether we can keep down the expenditure within the enormous amount of $3,000,000.

He further said:

If that question should be deemed an essential point, the citizens of Philadelphia would themselves pay the expenses attendant upon the celebration, just as any other great city in this country probably would do.

That was the manner in which this bill was ushered in; that was the manner in which the House of Representatives was put to sleep; and this same tone was kept up to the very last. When the final bill passed, I find the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] talking in this manner. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] having remarked that this celebration came only once in a hundred years, the Senator from Pennsylvania said:

I have only risen to repeat what the Senator from Maine has said, that this will only happen once in a hundred years. Commissioners are selected from every State and Territory in the Union. They go there for the purpose of doing honor to their country. This is the only way in which the money can be raised without expense to the Government.

Observe, that is by this great corporation which was formed, and which the Senator from Illinois, Mr. Trumbull, objected to as dangerous, in that it made a corporation with enormous capital by the laws of the United States within a State.

He said further:

A million people, it is expected, will each subscribe ten dollars, and thus $10,000,000 will be subscribed.

Am I not right in saying that this was a mistake all the way through? All these plans have gone awry.

It is necessary to have some responsibility for this. All they ask of the Government is that the Treasury Department shall print their certificates of stock, so that if they are counterfeited the counterfeiter may be punished. They ask nothing else of the Government. There is no doubt they will raise the money.

Besides, the press of the country, who have had the bill before them for a good while, have everywhere approved of it—even our friend with the white hat in the Tribune. I think in an article a column long in his excellent paper he approved it. I do not think anybody will object to it. The only reason I desire it passed now is that the commissioners are in session at Philadelphia, and they are anxious about it, and are telegraphing that, if the bill is passed to-night, they will to-morrow go to work immediately to procure this money.

Under such suggestions as these, Congress was led on step by step, and its feet, as I say, entangled in this proposition; and now gentlemen turn upon us and say, "It is bad faith for you not to appropriate this money." Can we not better say to them, "It was bad faith in you to represent over and over again that it was not intended that the exhibition should cost the Treasury a dollar, and that it would not cost the Government one dollar; that all you asked, or ever would ask, was that we would print your certificates of stock and put around them certain guards against their being counterfeited?" Was it not there that the bad faith was, if it was foreseen? If it was not foreseen, if it was a mistake, if it was a blunder, how much reliance can we place now upon the judgment of the same gentlemen, sincere unquestionably, who come forward and say, "We only want $3,000,000," when the Vienna exposition has already cost $10,000,000, and there is a deficiency of $7,500,000 more?

My friend, the other Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] said, on this same occasion, referring to Mr. Trumbull:

I suppose the Senator from Illinois really desired more to occupy a few moments until the Senate would assemble, than to make any serious opposition to the passage of this bill.

The thing was passed through lightly, playfully. The Senator from Pennsylvania said, "Of course the Senator desires only to make a few remarks while the Senate is gathering; nobody could object to this bill." A matter which was to cost the Treasury ultimately, if it succeeded, millions of dollars, was to be thus put through with an air!

When the subject was first introduced in Congress it was feared that an appropriation would be asked.

It was in May, 1872, not two years ago, that these remarks were made.

Everybody in both Houses was so sensitive on that question that an express disavowal of all responsibility on the part of the Government had to be incorporated in the act.

Did that mean anything? There was a sensitiveness. Congress did not want to put itself in a position where it would have to show bad faith afterward or redeem faith by the expenditure of millions for a local celebration. I say this has been a mistake from the very start, for I must believe that my friends from Pennsylvania were in perfect good faith when they said this corporation would collect $10,000,000, and when they said that the city of Philadelphia would pay this amount rather than call upon the Government for it. They were in perfect good faith in that. They did not expect anything of the kind; but they made blunders all the way through, and they have entrapped Congress into a false position.

Now, sir, there can be no harm in having the Senate distinctly see in this connection exactly what the sensitiveness of Congress referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania resulted in. They were sensitive, he says, lest an appropriation should be asked; and to remove any such idea and to banish it completely from the mind of Congress, a provision was put in the bill that there should be no liability whatever on the part of the Government of the United States, no pledge of its faith—that is what it means—so that it could thereafter refuse appropriations and say we have acted in perfect good faith. Section 7 of the act of March 3, 1871, has already been referred to. One-half or two-thirds of the language of that section was put in in the House on my motion, and the rest of it was inserted in the Senate on the motion of the senior Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] Section 7 is so clear that he who runs may read; and I say that the faith of Congress is not entangled in this matter. Let me read that section:

That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States; and the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition, or by reason of the same.

That is what Congress said, being sensitive upon this matter; and this language was put in in order to remove that sensitiveness, so that we could say in any event, we were not liable, our faith was not pledged; it is not a question of the character of the Congress of the United States; if anybody's character is lost it is the character of those who have been managing this thing, either under false pretenses, or else without proper regard to the assurances which they gave to Congress.

But we were not satisfied with that. When the final bill came up which created this great corporation, another provision was put in, just as emphatic, bringing it down to 1872, and then it was provided:

But nothing in this act shall be so construed as to create any liability of the United States, direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred, nor for any claim by the centennial international exhibition, or the corporation hereby created, for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States in support or liquidation of any debts or obligations created by the corporation herein authorized.

Could anything be more explicit than that? Is the character of Congress involved in this matter? Is it a question of character? If so, I ask again, of whose character? Here are two solemn special enactments by Congress, yielding to the request and solicitation of those gentlemen who said, "Why, of course, the bill shows that it is not to be a charge upon the Treasury of the United States; Senators talk merely to occupy time; they can have no particular objection to this bill passing;" and gentlemen coming from Philadelphia and insisting that Philadelphia held the cradle of American liberty, that it was a glorious and renowned city, and we ought to recognize it in order that they might have a grand celebration there at their own cost, not to involve the Government at all, simply to "give it a name," as Mrs. Gamp says, "that was all they asked;" provide that our certificates of stock shall not be counterfeited any more than national money, in order that we may not be the victim of counterfeiters and may prosecute those who do counterfeit by United States laws. In pursuance of those ideas this bill being passed through as a compliment to that locality, I say unless we go further now and in the name of the United States extend to all nations a cordial welcome to come and participate in this celebration, in the language of the pending bill, I shall not feel that my character is involved, or that of any member of Congress, in refusing to vote for appropriations for this purpose.

But allow me to say, and I say it after reflection, that if the bill now pending shall pass, going away beyond anything any civilized nation ever has done in calling the attention of the nations of the earth to its exhibitions, involving the good name and fame of the United States in making this celebration a splendid and magnificent cost to the national treasury, I shall not feel, either as a member of the Senate or as a member of the committee having charge to watch over appropriations, that I have a right to refuse to report to the Senate or vote for appropriations commensurate with the needs of this exhibition; and, furthermore, that if it shall be undertaken by men having no experience in these matters, as these commissioners have not, and carried on with the limited resources outside of the Treasury at their command, and it shall be afterward found that there will be a deficit of seven or eight millions, like that at Vienna, or, as is more probable, considering the greater cost of such things here, of fifteen or twenty millions, I shall consider the national faith just as much bound to paying those debts, and shall vote to pay them to avoid scandal. But, fortunately, up to this point our character is not involved, and we have a right to say, "This was never intended to be a charge upon the Treasury of the United States, and we will not make it so."

Now, Mr. President, there are reasons that suggest themselves to
